Now, under the statement of facts which I have given, it did seem to me, after careful consideration, that any man of common sense would say—what? Would any man of common sense say, "Take him in, and then," without another additional fact being brought to light, knowing then what we know now and nothing more, "turn him out"—declare one minute that he is fit to occupy a seat on this floor, and the next, knowing nothing more, that he is not fit to retain it? I do not think any man of common sense would say that. He would say, "if he is not fit to stay, if his character and status is such that if we take him in he would not be fit to stay, he can not be fit to enter." [Applause.]

This is the common sense of it. This is what the law ought to be. And I believe that it will be found that this is what the law is. I know that some people seem to have the impression that to be a great lawyer one must be able to give legal grounds for doing that which common sense would dictate ought not to be done, and for not doing that which ought to be done. I have always found that what common sense dictates the law almost invariably sanctions. This is what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] himself would say, if it were not for the second clause of the second section of the first article of the Constitution. That clause is the beginning and the end of it with the gentleman from Maine, and if he is right in his construction of that clause, in my judgment he is right in his conclusion.

I will not stop to read this clause. We all know it by heart: No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained, etc., twenty-five years of age, seven years a citizen, and an inhabitant of the State. These are the qualifications. Now, mark this, gentlemen. These are the qualifications that he must have, and none others can be required, says the gentleman from Maine. And if he has these, no matter what else he may be, you must take him in, even if you have to turn him out the next minute.

He may be a driveling idiot, an avowed traitor, a convicted felon, a person known to be disloyal to the Government, a person occupying a status and living in a practice so abhorrent to the moral sentiment of the country, so utterly subversive of our ideas of civilization, organized society, and stable government, that the law passed by this body and now in force, wherever its jurisdiction to pass such laws extends, has made it a disqualification for any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument, great or small, from a Cabinet office to the smallest crossroads post-office, and yet we are obliged to admit him.

Now, I have the greatest respect for and I stand in awe of a great lawyer, especially a great constitutional lawyer, and I suppose my friend from Maine is one. I listened day before yesterday with unflagging interest to his long speech. I felt the spell of his magnificent presence, his splendid voice, his brilliant eloquence, his keen sarcasm, and his incomparable and incomparably unconscious sophistry. [Laughter and applause.] I heard that string of glittering adjectives, winding up with the word "absurd," with which he was pleased to characterize one of the conclusions reported by what he was pleased to imply was the constitutional sewing circle, composed of the majority of the special committee. Notwithstanding the awe with which I have been inspired, while I can not match him in adjectives, I do say that to my mind this proposition is simply "absurd."

Here are negatives everywhere in this clause. Shall we be stampeded, as it were, by the rule of construction, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius? (I give you the English pronunciation, and if there are Latin critics here I should probably be able to give you the Continental.) [Laughter.] Shall we not rather recognize that it may not apply, and in expressions of this kind usually does not apply? Shall we be chained to the letter and discard the reason? Read it again. Does it mean any more than it says? The Representative must not be under 25 years of age, he must have been seven years a citizen, he must be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen. These qualifications he must have. We can not permit him to have any less. But does it say, does it even imply, that we can not require something more? Does it say, does it even imply, that we can not protect ourselves against a traitor, or one so grossly unfit that it would be our imperative duty, to preserve the honor of the House, to cast him out immediately upon his admission, and we know this, when he comes to the bar of the House, unless he is so young that he may be reformed and therefore had better be kept out of Congress? [Laughter.]

If he is old and hardened, must we take him in? Does not the language imply exactly the reverse? Does it not leave to the House some latitude of judgment as to who is fit to sit in this exalted body? It seems to me to be too plain for argument. And here I call attention to something which the gentleman from Maine failed to notice, or forgot to state, as to the extract which he read in this connection from Judge Story. He has no greater reverence for that great man than I have. That extract was taken from a discussion by that eminent jurist of the question of whether a State could by law require more than is specifically mentioned in this clause of the Constitution. To the proposition that it can not, we all say, Amen, although Mr. Jefferson was disposed to think the other way. But we are now considering our power. Mark that, gentlemen. We are now considering our power—that is, the power of this body.

But I am debating this question with a great constitutional lawyer, and there are others here too. I do not dare to have the rashness to put my construction of this clause alone against theirs. I must have something more to sustain my timidity and overcome my awe in their presence, and so I go along a little further and I find this provision in the Constitution:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

And I feel a little strengthened. I think it may be barely possible that I am not utterly and absurdly wrong in thinking that the Constitution leaves us a little leeway.

And still further on, this provision:

> The Senators and Representatives * * * shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification, etc.

"Shall be required as a qualification." Does not this language mean something? And can it mean anything else than that while we can not require a religious test as a qualification, we may require other tests as qualifications? [Applause.]

If the former section was the beginning and the end of the matter of qualifications, why use the word at all here? And again—still timidly I confess, for it is still possible that not a single ray of light has found its way to the constitutional sewing circle [laughter]—I venture to think that perhaps this language may mean that while we can not prescribe an oath in which a member seeking admission shall swear that he is or is not a Catholic, or a Presbyterian, or a Baptist, or believes in the Trinity, or conforms to this or that ceremonial, and if he does not take it, keep him out; yet we might prescribe one in which he must swear that he has not voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, and if he will not so swear, and even we are satisfied that he can not so swear, keep him out. [Applause.]

And I venture to think, further, that we may prescribe an oath in which a man shall swear that he is not a polygamist, and if he does not so swear we may keep him out. For the Supreme Court of the United States has held that in no way can polygamy be considered a religious tenet or practice. And I venture further to believe that we could keep him out even if we believed that he would so swear, if we were satisfied that in doing so he would commit perjury. Do we believe that this man would so swear, or could so swear?

When I have got thus far—now, mark you, I have been considering the Constitution; I have not looked a step further than the Constitution itself, reading it in its own light—when I get thus far, I venture to think, still timidly, I confess, but the thought takes hold of me, as it were, that from the very nature of things the power to keep out such persons as I have described must be inherent and implied in every legislative body, and that the body must be the sole judge of when the necessity exists, and that perhaps it was possible that when those wise old fathers framed the Constitution they recognized this ever-present and ever-necessary power, and therefore framed the age, citizenship, and inhabitancy clause, negatively as they did, and added these other clauses, so that the less able and conspicuous members of our ancient profession might stumble on their meaning. [Laughter.] And that perhaps some not lawyers at all, like my eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], who spoke yesterday, might at least catch a little glimpse of it. [Laughter.]

When my mind begins to run in this direction I feel a little uneasy. I think that perhaps it may be going like a wild engine, on the track it may be, but likely at any moment to run smash into one of these more majestic and ponderous pieces of legal machinery. [Laughter.] And so I wonder if anybody else has entertained these thoughts before. I wonder if anybody else has traveled the same road. I begin to feel the need of company. I begin to feel the need of authority, as the gentleman from Maine would say. [Laughter.] And so I turn to the fathers themselves. I look to see what they said while they were making this instrument, and as I read their debates and examine the final draft of this clause I interpret what they say as in accord with my view, and so do the majority of your committee.

But the gentlemen of the minority say that we are dismally and hopelessly wrong in our interpretation. You have seen and heard read, and ably debated here, these debates. Only fragments have been preserved, and they are not at all satisfactory. I shall not now go over that ground, so well covered by others. I leave it to the House. But if they are right, it does seem very strange that some of the text writers, to whom I turn next, have not discovered it. It would seem that what these old fathers said would have deterred some of them from being so positive in expressing themselves according to our contention, and would have encouraged others to come out a little stronger for the contention of the minority than they have done.

Turning to these text-book writers, and I think the committee examined them all, I do not find any of them directly holding that we can not impose additional qualifications to those mentioned in section 2 of Article I. And I do find a number of them who assert in so many words that we can. But our friends of the minority say these text writers are not to be relied on. They are not authority. It is true they have spent their days and nights in poring over the Constitution and the decisions directly and remotely bearing upon it, and trying to extract from it and from these decisions its true meaning, but they may be mystified and confused. We must examine the case ourselves. So let us pass on.

We then go to the cases, and what do we find there? I assert here, what the gentleman from Massachusetts said a while ago, that there is no authority in the case books directly in point on this question—that is, no case in which this clause of the Constitution has been directly construed. Any lawyer can understand why there would not be. We being the judges of the qualifications of our members, and we having decided, what court can review our decision? You may look in all the Supreme Court reports and you find none. You may look through the State reports and you find none except those construing somewhat analogous provisions of State constitutions.

Amongst these State cases you will find some which seem to sustain the view of the minority. You will find others which seem to sustain the position of the majority. Of these it seemed to me that those sustaining our position were the best considered and were the most cogent in their reasoning. I can not stop to consider these cases in detail. My time will not permit. But let us for a minute examine that one to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] referred, and which he pushed aside with a wave of his hand—the case in Ohio, considered, as it was, by one of the ablest judges of that State. There the provision of the constitution was that no person should be elected or appointed to any office in the State unless he possessed the qualifications of an elector. The legislature created an office. That is admitted. It was an office. And they imposed certain additional qualifications which, in their judgment, were reasonable and necessary and which were conceded to be reasonable and necessary to the proper exercise of the duties of the office. It was contended that they could not do that. The case was taken to the supreme court, and that court held that they could impose these additional qualifications.

Now, mark you, there was a similar provision to the one under consideration, similarly expressed in negative form: "No person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this State unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector." And the court held that this meant that the legislature could not authorize the appointment of a person not possessing the qualifications of an elector, but they could require additional qualifications which were reasonable and necessary for the proper discharge of his duties. The reasoning of that case is to my mind extremely cogent and, indeed conclusive, and it sustains the position of the majority of your committee. Now, how does the gentleman from Maine distinguish that case? He meets it by saying that it was an office created by the legislature. But he admits it was an office. The words are "any office in the State." Was it an office in the State? In some way or other the gentleman reasons it out of the State. How it got away I can not tell; neither can you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCPHERSON. And he read words into the Ohio State constitution.

Mr. MORRIS. I do not remember that. Now, so much for that case. There is another case in the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States. I forgot to mention it in the proper place. I state here that it is not directly in point, because it was upon another subject. In it Chief Justice Marshall used words which can have no other construction than that which sustains my position. He said that one would be charged with insanity who should contend that we could not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution. Now, that is as nearly in point as any case from our highest court. It does not construe this particular provision, but it does throw some light upon it by its interpretation of one of the other provisions to which I have referred.

Now, I leave the cases and come to the lawmakers—this House, the Senate of the United States, and the President of the United States. And what do I find? As far back as 1790 I find the lawmakers passing a statute that any man who gives a bribe to a judge, or any judge who receives one, shall be forever disqualified to hold any office under the United States.

I come a little further down and I find another statute which disqualifies any member of Congress who receives or asks a bribe from holding any office under the United States. A little further on I find another statute disqualifying any person who shall incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States from holding any office under the United States, and still further on another requiring men who should stand at the bar of this House demanding admission to swear that they had not voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the Government. I find these and I suppose I might find others of similar object and import. Here they are. The lawmakers constantly asserting and exercising the right to impose such disqualifications, and thereby asserting negatively the right to require additional qualifications, and I find nowhere this authority or right questioned. Gentlemen have only to examine these statutes to see that in the term "office under the United States," they all by necessary implication include that of member of Congress, and in two of them they do so in so many words.

But gentlemen say that legislatures and lawmakers act upon the passions of the hour. Great heavens! Is a legislature acting upon the passions of the hour when it imposes this penalty for taking a bribe?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It is rather wholesome.

Mr. MORRIS. We will leave out the question of treason, we will leave out the question of giving aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the Government. Is there anything indicating passion, is there anything indicating haste, is there anything indicating any undue or improper motive, in requiring that a man who accepts a bribe shall not sit in this exalted body?

And then I come to where I do find precedent. I come to where I find precedent directly in point, where this question was directly up, where it has been directly decided. I come to the place alone where it could come up. I come to this House and to that body at the other end of the Capitol, and what do I find? I find the most eminent members of both bodies advocating precisely the doctrine which I have laid down, and both Houses in a number of cases adopting and sustaining it, and in no case denying it.

Now, gentlemen may say, some lawyers may say, that these gentlemen, Senators of the United States and members of this House, do not live and move and have their being in that high, calm, pure, serene atmosphere from which judges look down. They were only Senators and Representatives in Congress. They were not judges. They were swayed by the passions and prejudices of the hour. I for one can not help being so unorthodox as to believe that they were just as upright, just as pure, just as ready to stand for the right interpretation of the Constitution, lead to whatever result it might, as any judge. Read what they say. It is just as calm, just as cold, just as deliberate, just as full of sound reason as are the deliverances of any judge. Why, gentlemen, there are many judges in both bodies, and I will guarantee that there are a thousand judges (perhaps I should say hundreds) in the United States who never will be United States Senators, or members of this body either, for that matter, because nobody will ever think they ought to be. [Laughter.]

These men, trained public men, many of them great constitutional lawyers, held, and contended for and established, by the votes of such men as Garfield and others that were mentioned by my friend from Iowa [Mr. McPHERSON], this exact doctrine. The gentleman from Maine spoke of "one Boutwell." I suppose that is the right way, the legal way, the constitutional way, to speak of our great Senators. He spoke of "one Dawes" and "one Shellabarger" and "one John A. Bingham." I venture to believe that these men will be considered great constitutional lawyers as long as any member of this House will be. I will not say until long after most of us are forgotten.

Now I do not wish either to consume my time or to detain the House unnecessarily, but let me read from these gentlemen. Here is Mr. Boutwell in a case where the question was exactly the one presented here:

That an avowed traitor, a convicted felon, or a person known to be disloyal to the Government has a constitutional right to be admitted into the body would imply that the Senate had no power of protecting itself—a power which, from the nature of things, must be inherent in every legislative body.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] spoke of what he was pleased to designate a general-welfare proposition, that we were acting on a general-welfare proposition. I say we are acting under the very first law of nature. We are acting under the law of self-preservation, not the self-preservation of the individual member, as was hinted in an article read from the desk here by the Clerk a short time ago, but the self-preservation of the life and the honor of this House. [Applause.]

A man has the right—higher than all law, recognized as inherent in and a part of all law—to protect his life and his honor; and I say that in a proposition of this kind the life of the Government and the life and honor of this House are involved. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CANNON). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman would like a little more time, and I ask that he may be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like a little more time. I shall only consider one branch of the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended to allow him to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I said I ventured to entertain this opinion. Here is Mr. Boutwell fully sustaining me in it. Here is another—a man who was for years a member of this body, who was for years a Senator of the United States, who was offered and declined the chief justiceship of the State of Massachusetts—Mr. Dawes. Let us read from him:

The committee adhere to the views expressed in the former report, that no man who has been engaged in an attempt to overthrow the Government and subvert the Constitution by force of arms, or who has voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons so engaged, ought to be admitted to a seat in this House to make laws for the nation he has traitorously sought to destroy; and it is apparent that there must be power in this House to prevent this, the House being the judge of the qualifications of its members, of which fidelity to the Constitution is one, and that this end can only be certainly accomplished by the investigating of any specific and apparently well-grounded charge of personal disloyalty made against a person claiming his seat as a member of this House before such person is permitted to take the seat.

The House concurred in this view of the committee by adopting the resolution under which the committee is now acting. The principle upon which this preliminary investigation was ordered was adopted by Congress when the oath of office to be taken by members of this House was prescribed by law, and the preliminary investigation of specific and apparently well-founded charges against a person claiming a seat in this House is only an additional mode of attaining the same result sought to be secured by requiring the oath to be taken by all persons who become members of the House. The same principle has been affirmed by the President of the United States in his annual message, December 4, 1866, in which he says:

"In the admission of Senators and Representatives from all of the States there can be no just ground of apprehension that persons who are disloyal will be clothed with the powers of legislation, for this could not happen when the Constitution and the laws are enforced by a vigilant and faithful Congress. Each House is made the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members, and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. When a Senator or Representative presents his certificate of election he may at once be admitted or rejected; or, should there be any question as to his eligibility, his credentials may be referred for investigation to the appropriate committee.

"If admitted to a seat, it must be upon evidence satisfactory to the House of which he thus becomes a member that he possesses the requisite constitutional and legal qualifications. If refused admission as a member for want of due allegiance to the Government and returned to his constituents, they are admonished that none but persons loyal to the United States will be allowed a voice in the legislative councils of the nation, and the political power and moral influence of Congress are thus effectively exerted in the interest of loyalty to the Government of the United States and fidelity to the Union."

Something was said by the gentleman from Maine about the fourteenth amendment and its having been adopted about the time that Mr. Dawes made this report. To show that his opinion and report were not based on that amendment we have only to read his speech. Here it is:

Now, sir, to those of us who believe that that fourteenth article is already a part of the Constitution, there is an expressed inhibition upon this man contained in that article. I do not care to take the time of the House in discussing the question whether it is or is not a part of the Constitution. I plant myself upon the Constitution without amendment.

Mark that!

I plant myself upon the Constitution without amendment. I hold that in its lifeblood there is power to protect itself by all means not prohibited and adequate to the end.

Here is another—Mr. Shellabarger, of Ohio. And certainly these gentlemen will not contend that Mr. Shellabarger is not an authority. Speaking of this oath clause, he says:

To hold that the oath of office required to be taken by Representatives and other officers named in the sixth article and first section of the Constitution excludes them from being required by law to take any further obligation is, as seems to me, not only in violation of the express terms of the Constitution—

Mark that!

but is in the face of both the reason and the practice which construes this section. Such construction is against the text itself of the Constitution, because that prescribes the thing which shall not be required as a qualification for office, to wit, "religious tests." Now surely, if the prescribing of one thing which each member should be required to do and swear was in this case meant to exclude all other requirements, then it was not only useless but calculated to mislead and deceive, to go on and give one and only one qualification as the one which Congress might not require the officer to have. Surely the prescribing of one test as one that may not be required as much proves that any other test may be established as the fixing of one test being required excludes others from being required.

The plain sense, therefore, of this clause is to name one quality which at least every member shall have, and one which at least shall not be required, and to leave the other qualifications to be regulated by the laws of the Government which the Constitution established. If this is not so, and if this clause excludes any officer named in the clause from being required to take any further obligation by his oath of office than that one named in the Constitution, then no State officer named in the same clause could be required to swear to support his State constitution; and no officer, State or Federal, could be required by law to take an oath to discharge well the duties of his office. Plainly this clause is not meant to exclude all other qualifications for Federal office as unconstitutional.

Exactly the same remarks apply to all other clauses touching the qualifications, etc., of officers and members. None of them can be construed to prohibit Congress from excluding from office an open and avowed traitor to his country any more than they can be construed to deny Congress the right to exclude the convicted felon or the insane from such offices. Congress, then, may by law exclude traitors from the offices of the Government, and "each House," if not bound by such law as a law, may and ought at least to adopt such a "law" as a "rule," not to be departed from as to the qualifications of its members. I therefore hold that the House would do—against its dignity, its purity, its patriotism, and fitness to make laws—an act most monstrous, if not absolutely fatal, did it not, with unremitting vigor and sleepless vigilance, enforce this great act for the exclusion of the Government's enemies from the control of the Government's life, and of course this law, which should have to each House at least the force of an inflexible "rule," should be applied alike in each House.

Here we see the difference between the affirmative and the negative form in naming and fixing qualifications. Had the second clause of the second section of Article I said that every person who is 25 years of age, who has been seven years a citizen, and who is an inhabitant of the State, may be a Representative, then it might be said that, possessing these qualifications, nothing in addition could be required. But the form of expression being that no person shall be unless he is, etc., then he is obliged to have the qualifications mentioned. But you may impose something more upon him; something that he ought to have as he stands in this great and honorable body; something that ought to be about every member here; something that would make its standard such as to command the respect of the people, or at least not to degrade and dishonor it or make it contemptible.

That was Mr. Shellabarger's position. But let us go on. Here is another, Mr. Beltzhoover of Pennsylvania:

But admitting for the purposes of this discussion—

Now, gentlemen, I want you to consider this language, because we have heard it slightingly said that that was Delegate and not Representative Cannon, and therefore that case could not be cited as authority here. I admit that there would be a great difference between the case of a Delegate and a Representative. But I am citing the opinions of the men who passed on it—the opinion of the court, as it were; and it shows that they did not think it necessary in such a case to distinguish between Delegate and Representative. They held that the right and authority existed in either case—

But admitting for the purposes of this discussion what can not be maintained, that the same qualifications which entitle a Member of Congress to admission shall also entitle a Delegate to the same right, and I still hold—

Whether Delegate or Member—that Congress has the right and power to say—to say that a polygamist shall not be admitted as a Delegate. Under the high power inherent in every organization on earth to preserve its integrity and existence—

What?—

Mark that—the doctrine of self-preservation—

Congress has the indubitable right to keep out of its councils any person whom it believes to be dangerous and hostile to the Government.

That was Mr. Beltzhoover. And so I might read others; but in view of the fact that the House has so kindly extended my time, under the impression that I would be as brief as possible, and since there are others who must be heard to-day, I shall not do so.

These were the views expressed by the leading men in both Houses in cases involving the identical question now under consideration, and these were the grounds on which action was taken.

And I assert that in every case where either body has found it necessary to do it, where some such trouble as this which confronts us has been suggested in reference to the member-elect, whether they have finally excluded him or not, they have always upheld their power and right to exclude him. They have invariably asserted their jurisdiction to exclude him. Not a case can be found to the contrary.

Now, gentlemen, when I find myself in such very respectable company as this, I begin to shake off a little of that awe with which I had been inspired by these great constitutional lawyers, and begin to think that I may after all know as much about it as they do. [Laughter.] And so when I find I am in company with such men as Boutwell, and Sumner, and Dawes, and Beltzhoover, and Garfield, and Logan, and BURROWS, and a host of others, I begin to think that maybe we can report to this House the resolution which we have adopted. In fact, I lead myself to the conclusion that not only am I right to report it, but that under my honor, my oath, and my duty as a member of this House I am bound to report it.

I hold then, Mr. Speaker, we have the right to do this by virtue of the power which from the nature of things must be inherent in every legislative body. I hold that we have the right to do this by virtue of the power clearly existing in and under the Constitution by the form of expression and the evident meaning of the clause naming the minimum qualifications, by the clause making the House the judge of the member's qualifications, and by the oath clause clearly and by necessary implication conferring the power to require such reasonable and necessary tests in the nature of qualifications as the safety of the country and the dignity, the honor, the practical and potential existence of the House shall demand. And, having this right, I hold that in a proper case we are, under our oaths, in honor bound to exercise it.

But some gentleman may inquire, How shall it be determined what is a proper case? I answer by the conscientious judgment of a majority of the House. And I say further that the majority, having reached that judgment prior to admission, is in duty bound to exercise and enforce it. Let us suppose a man standing here in front of the Speaker ready to take the oath, who, as the majority believe, is, by reason of his being a notorious and defiant lawbreaker, by reason of his standing as the representative, or at least the practicer and apologist, of a social status and practice at which public opinion revolts as striking at the foundations of civilization and society, so absolutely unfit for the duties and responsibilities of membership here that if we let him in, we ought, without doing another thing about it, without making an additional inquiry, without waiting for another suggestion, to cast him out at once. Must we, the majority, authorized by the Constitution to judge not only of the elections and returns but also of the qualifications of those who are to sit here, authorized to add to the oath qualifications, testing the moral character and fitness of the man presenting himself, provided they do not contain religious tests—must we, because it happens that a minority greater than one-third disagrees with us, be obliged not only to take this man in but to keep him in? Must we be obliged to accept a man here whose presence would, in our judgment, be contrary to the public safety, a blow at one of the most cherished institutions of our social order, and a stain upon the honor of the country and of the House?

Must we, because a minority greater than one-third should say we had no right to expel him, be prevented from protecting the country, this House, and ourselves? Should we not rather say that such a person is disqualified to sit here, and that it is our duty to see to it that he is not permitted to do so?

But gentlemen say they would vote to expel him. Let us take him in and then put him out.

I say no. To paraphrase the language of Mr. Dawes: If he has a right to enter this body notwithstanding his status, what right have we to expel him afterwards for being in that status? If we have the right to expel him for that status, have we not the right to keep him out for the same status? Why would they expel? There can be no other reason except that we believe it for the public safety and for the safety, dignity, and honor of this House. If it is unsafe to trust the public safety and the safety and honor of this House to the keeping of such a man by permitting him to remain in his seat here, is it not equally unsafe to admit him into his seat?

If the public safety calls upon us to expel a man after he has put himself into the seat, is not the public safety regarded more and is not the public safer by not letting him into the seat at all? If the public safety is intrusted to us, is it not the bounden duty of the majority, when in their judgment the public safety requires it, to protect itself and the public against the will of the minority, however great? It does not matter how great the minority is. When the majority thinks the public safety and the safety and honor of this House are involved, not only is it its right but it is its imperative duty to protect that safety and honor.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] wants to know where this is going to stop. He says the next thing we will be keeping out the adulterer. I say that when an open, notorious, and defiant adulterer shall present himself at the bar of this House, and the House shall know it then, as we know the facts in this case now, and the majority of it shall think that he ought to be put out the instant he is let in, it will be the duty of that majority to keep him out. [Applause.] The gentleman says that a great many people in his State, perhaps a majority, think a rumseller is as bad as a polygamist, and that the next thing they will be demanding, and we will, by the rule we now adopt, be obliged to comply with that demand, that a rumseller be kept out. I say no. The gentleman knows that rumselling is not a crime, and that, on the contrary, it is a licensed and recognized occupation by most of the States and by the United States. But I do say that if the time shall ever come, as I do not believe it ever will, when rumselling shall be a crime under the laws of every Commonwealth represented here, under the laws of the United States, a crime of universal abhorrence, and universally regarded as against civilization, society, and good government, then it will be the duty of the Representatives who shall then be here to keep such a person out. [Applause.]

He says we will be stopping men at the threshold of this body on this or that trivial and insignificant ground. The gentleman knows, or ought to know, that the doctrine we advocate leads to no such conclusion. The doctrine we advocate is that Congress, this House, can disqualify and reject a man as a member here who is shown to be guilty of such crimes or occupying such a status as in the judgment of decent and law-abiding men everywhere render him unfit to act as a member of this body. And this doctrine is upheld by courts and legislatures, and by lawmakers and law interpreters on the floors of both Houses in this Capitol.

Gentlemen on the other side say one minute that we are setting a dangerous precedent, and the next that we are bound by no precedents. They talk about the passion and prejudice of the hour when we speak of the precedents already established in this and the other House of Congress, and say that we should be guided only by what our judgment and reason and conscience demand. While I do not agree with them as to these precedents, while they command my respect and satisfy my judgment, I accept in a measure what they say.

I, too, agree that we must do our duty as we see it and let any House that may come after us do their duty as they shall see it. But they say that by this action we are setting a precedent which will open the gates to revolution. Let me say that if any House shall come after us ready and in the spirit of revolution, they will not stop to consult the precedents made by this or any other House. When they get ready for revolution, ready to violate both the spirit and letter of the Constitution, no precedent will bind them. If they should seek them, and are willing to torture the meaning of the one which will be set by the adoption of this report to their unlawful purposes, they already have them in former Houses and in former Senates. They already have one in this case which will be just as effective for those who wish to misconstrue it and turn it to unlawful purposes as any we can make. If they shall be so lost to the dictates of prudence and patriotism, so forgetful of the obligation of their oaths, as to be willing to accomplish their ends by arbitrary and unjustifiable action, they will not stop for precedents.

If they shall determine arbitrarily to keep men out who have been elected here and who are fit and worthy to be here, they will not stop to inquire whether we were justified in our action or not. When such a time shall come, as I hope it never will come, there will be nothing left to do but for the people to rise in their might and turn them out of this Capitol. When revolution comes, gentlemen, the only remedy is the gun. No, gentlemen, it is enough for us to do our duty as we see it under our consciences, under our responsibility to our constituencies and to the whole people and leave those who come after us to their consciences and their responsibility as they shall see it. [Applause.] As we see it, if this man as he stands here ought immediately to be thrown out if we let him in, we ought not to let him in; and if it is within the power of the majority to keep him out, it is the duty of that majority to do so. The universal sentiment of the people is that he ought not to disgrace and degrade this body with his presence for one minute or for one second; and the people are right. They know that he is now and has been for a long time living in a status and guilty of a practice which is in violation of the law of every State in the Union, which is in violation of the law of the United States, and for which that law disqualifies any person from holding any office in the Government.

I wish I had the time to refer to this Edmunds Act and its bearing on this case. But I can not take more of the time of the House from my associates on the committee, who are to follow me. I only say this, that this man assumed the status of a polygamist in the Territory of Utah after that law was passed, in open and defiant violation of it. He has kept that status ever since. He is a polygamist now. When he shall stand in front of the Speaker to be sworn he will be a polygamist. And as such polygamist he has been and is now disqualified from holding any office under the Government. I do not say that we are absolutely bound by that law. I agree with Mr. Boutwell when he says—let me read it:

> Doubtless a law of Congress declaring that a person convicted of a particular offense should not hold office under the United States, and the decision of the courts sustaining such a law, would not preclude the Senate from admitting such a person to a seat, should it think proper, because the Senate is the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Yet it is hardly conceivable that the Senate ever would admit such a person to be sworn.

And I say it is hardly conceivable that this House ever would admit such a person to be sworn.

And not only has he put himself in that status in violation of the law, but he makes no apology or excuse. On the contrary, he defends and takes pride in it. No longer than day before yesterday, on the floor of this House, he proclaimed in effect—I can not give his exact words—that, do what we might with him, exclude him or expel him, he would feel no sense of shame, he would acknowledge no delinquency, but as he walked from our presence the angels of light would "walk not half so dazzlingly the sapphire walls of heaven."

Nor have I the time to speak of the bad faith of the people of Utah. That in sending this man here they have been guilty of bad faith we all know. Expel him, in the face of all these facts! Make this a matter entirely personal to him! Shall we not rather say to these people, "We judge you by your representative. When you come to a realization of what this country considers to be decency, and honor, and law, and civilization, and good government, and send us one here who does not fly in the face of all of it—when you do this, send him along; but until you do, neither you nor your representative shall be recognized here." [Applause.]

And, now, can there be any question of our duty? Will a majority of this House flee from its responsibility and duty? I for one protest against the giving of this man a seat in this House for one instant by our own will and consent. We could not help his being elected and certified here. I protest against it in the name of those unfortunate women whom this practice can but disgrace and degrade. I protest against it in the name of those children whom it has been, and is, and will be branding with the ineradicable stain, the scarlet letter of illegitimacy. I protest against it in the name of the motherhood and womanhood of the land. I protest against it in the name of all the people of the purest and best nation of the earth. I protest against it by the Constitution of our country. I protest against it by the law of the land which this man has broken and defied. I protest against it in the name of civilization and society, whose pillars he would pull down. [Applause.]

Make a precedent! Make a precedent of this case! Will ever such another be seen? Make a precedent of this case! I hope, I trust, I believe that there never will be tried at the bar of this House another like it. Solve this matter as I would have you, and you can set no precedent for any House. This is a case of its own kind. It stands solitary and alone, and in the name of the womanhood and manhood of the country I pray you, gentlemen, let it stand forever solitary and alone. [Applause.]

This is a question that every man must answer on his honor and his conscience. I keep no man's conscience. I accord and concede to every man honesty of conviction and belief. But when the law sustains us, and precedent sustains us, and decency sustains us, and that which is higher than all law, which inheres in all law, sustains us, as we are confronted with this man, there can be but one duty, and I hope, I believe, this House will perform it. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the speeches of this session, and am glad to find that there are so many saints in this body, and such good saints. This House is composed of editors, preachers, merchants—men following many vocations—as well as lawyers, and, as usual, the laymen seem to know more about this complicated question of constitutional procedure than the lawyers of acknowledged reputation.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that by the recent speeches we have been led away from the main proposition. Some of the speakers, especially the one who has last closed his remarks, have been standing up straw men and then knocking them down for the amusement of himself and the galleries and the delectation of his constituency.

The real proposition before this body is a plain one and should be dealt with in a practical manner, with due regard to the mandates of the Constitution.

A committee brings in reports, one a majority and the other a minority. Both reports agree that the Representative sent by the State of Utah shall not be permitted to retain a seat in this body by reason of the fact that he is a polygamist—that against the mandates of the constitution of the State of Utah and against her laws he has remained a polygamist, and has continued up to the present time to cohabit with plural wives, and by reason of this behavior he is not a fit person to remain a member of Congress.

I believe this last conclusion is held by not only two-thirds of the members of this House but by everyone. I certainly hold it and will vote for his expulsion as soon as he has taken the oath, if he is permitted to take it.

The real question before us is one of procedure. What is the proper course to be pursued in ridding this body of the gentleman from Utah? What is the best course to take, the legal course, the course which will neither strain nor break the mandates of the Constitution? There being over two-thirds of the members of this body ready to vote for his expulsion, it can not fairly be urged that the desire to get rid of him justifies irregular procedure of, to say the least, doubtful constitutionality, and necessitates the establishment of a bad precedent.

This will always be a celebrated case, not only by reason of the interest it has excited among the people residing in every State of the Union, but by reason of the subject-matter—polygamy.

We are about to establish a precedent, not hastily and without due consideration, but after careful examination, due deliberation, and the widest discussion.

The constitutional questions involved have been examined with especial care; the speeches and writings of the framers of our great Constitution have been searched and presented; precedents have been unearthed, distinguished, and applied. The minority report is the result of the most diligent research, the most mature deliberation of trained judicial minds.

I believe the conclusions they have reached are not only logical and convincing, but incontrovertible. The speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] is not only a masterpiece of forensic oratory—admittedly the greatest speech made in this body for many years, one which marks him as a leader in this House—but bears microscopic examination, and up to this time has not been answered on a single important point by those who favor the majority report.

My time is entirely too limited to even point out what in my judgment are the vital points in the contention. The ground has been well and carefully gone over, and I could add little if anything to what has been said already by those who will support the minority report.

But this I do wish to say, that under my oath of office I feel bound to act in accordance with the plain path pointed out by the Constitution of this country strictly construed.

Brigham Roberts comes with the credentials of the State of Utah. He presents himself at the bar of this House and asks to be sworn in, not as Brigham Roberts, but as Utah's Representative.

The committee report that they have unanimously found him to possess the qualifications demanded by the Constitution for membership to the House of Representatives. I quote their words:

> We find that Brigham H. Roberts was elected as a Representative to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, and was at the date of his election above the age of 25 years; that he has been for more than seven years a naturalized citizen of the United States, and was an inhabitant of the State of Utah.

Under this finding I deny the right of this House to add any other qualification than those mentioned in the Constitution, and believe they are in duty bound to swear him in.

I very much doubt whether before he is sworn in and admitted to this body we have any right to take any action leading to his expulsion. I claim, further, that the action of exclusion advised by the majority report is tantamount to a vote to expel, and as such requires a two-thirds vote. I am informed that there are men who have signed the majority report that believe this doctrine, and claim that in order to be valid the majority report should be adopted by a two-thirds vote.

If this be true, why should not this question be disposed of in an orderly way, avoiding all questions of doubtful constitutional action and the establishment of a dangerous precedent?

The Constitution plainly states that "each House of Congress may, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member," thus pointing out plainly the proper manner of proceeding.

Such expulsion may be for any cause or reason which may seem sufficient to two-thirds of the members; in fact, it may be for no cause or reason, and merely arbitrary, if two-thirds of the House so decide; and there is no appeal to any other tribunal from such action.

This may not be so if the plan of exclusion is adopted and followed. In that case I believe such action may be nullified by the action of the Supreme Court and a mandamus awarded requiring him to be sworn in. The question of his right to pay beyond the date of his exclusion will arise and many other incidental questions, all of which will be obviated by his being sworn in and then expelled. Every petition coming from my district prays that he be expelled after being sworn in, showing that the lawyers who represented those who are at the head of this crusade against polygamy recognized the procedure advised by the minority report of the committee, and I believe they hold the right views and do not advise a violation of the plain words of the Constitution.

There is no room nor excuse for a proceeding which is not a whit different from lynch law. I have carefully examined the law and precedents and am convinced there is but one right, legal, and constitutional manner of proceeding—that that is to pass the minority report, swear him in, and then by a two-thirds vote immediately expel him. With this firm conviction of my duty under my constitutional oath, I will vote for the adoption of the minority report; and should it pass, I pledge myself to vote for his expulsion as soon as he by that action is admitted into this House. Believing as I do, under no circumstances can I vote for the majority report, which advises an unconstitutional procedure.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, the House, by the Constitution, is sole judge of the qualifications as well as the returns and election of its members. The qualifications specifically named in the Constitution—age, citizenship, and residence—the House has no power to change or vary in any way. But the unrestricted power to judge of qualifications includes moral turpitude in private character, being questions of personal fitness, ascertainable in well-known public acts or by judicial proceedings. The power to do this, even if it was not conferred in the Constitution, is inherent in every legislative body. It is upon this power the right of expulsion rests. In such cases the Constitution restricts its exercise by requiring a two-thirds vote. But the moral sense of the House and its duty to itself is the same whether its action is controlled by a majority or by two-thirds of its members, and the apprehended danger of bad precedents is just the same in one case as in the other.

Whether precedents are good or bad, they have no binding force upon the future. It would be an unwarranted reflection upon our institutions to suppose that the people's representatives who shall occupy these seats in the future will not discharge their duties as wisely as the present occupants.

Whatever fact would be a good and sufficient reason for the expulsion of a member, if the fact existed at the time of his application for admission to a seat, would be a good and sufficient reason for excluding him from taking a seat. Admit to-day and expel to-morrow for identically the same reason, well known to exist at the time of admission, would seem to be a useless proceeding for a legislative body. Expelling for identically the same offense that was condoned by admission would be the superlative refinement of hairsplitting constructions of the Constitution.

If it were true, which it is not, that there is no precedent for excluding an open, publicly avowed polygamist, even though duly elected, from taking a seat in the Congress of the United States, then it is time the House made one. In the entire history of Congress there never has been but one application for admission to a seat precisely like the one now before us. And in that case the House refused a seat to the applicant.

But in the consideration of grave questions of right and wrong, precedents are of little consequence, for the wrong always has them and the right must always make the new ones. In the onward progress of the race most of its great benefits have come to it by repealing old laws or by the abolition of old customs. And the greatest of all benefits through historic times was that of the crucified Nazarene in supplanting the old Mosaic dispensation by the new. In rebuking the Pharisees, who were seeking a justification for the Mosaic law of divorce, He said, "From the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh." To His precepts and to the new dispensation which He established, supplanting the old, is woman indebted for her release from the degradation and thralldom to which through the ages she had been consigned by barbaric and Asiatic civilizations.

Any system or element of society that degrades woman strikes a deadly blow at Christian civilization and inflicts a cruel wrong upon the motherhood of the race. While professed religious belief on any subject by the Constitution is no offense against the law, yet unlawful acts resting for their authority or defense on beliefs or opinions repugnant to the Christian civilization of the age are subject to, and in such cases deserve, the severest penalties of the law.

Polygamy, the worst of the lingering relics of the civilization of olden times, exists in this nation only among its tribes of wild Indians, the Mormons of Utah, and the inhabitants of the Sulu Islands. But the better influences of the new Christian dispensation, established by the Saviour in His teachings on the seashore and along the hillsides of Judea will ere long supplant everywhere this barbaric relic of Asiatic civilization. In the meantime I trust no countenance or approval is to be given to it by any act of Congress in admitting to a seat a well-known, publicly avowed polygamist, no matter how or by whom elected. For if there is a Congressional district which has no inhabitant to represent it free from such stain upon his character, then such district ought to be without representation in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from that section where, in the language of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], "honor is religion, where gallantry is law, and virtue the high ideal of beautiful womanhood," it is unnecessary for me to indulge in a philippic against Roberts or a diatribe on the horrors of polygamy. The opinion of the Southern people on this question is as firmly fixed as Christianity itself, and there is no member here from any one of the States of that section, or, indeed, from any section, who believes or will vote that a polygamist ought to hold a seat in this House.

It is impracticable, and, indeed, unnecessary, since the great legal argument of that great lawyer from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] on this question, for me now to go into an extended discussion of the legal questions involved. There is no question as to the facts. That Mr. Roberts is a polygamist, living in open defiance of the law, is practically admitted by himself. It follows, Mr. Speaker, that he should not hold a seat in the American Congress. But the question of how we shall get him out arises, and here we reach the "parting of the ways." The majority resolution provides—

That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant.

The minority of the committee proposes as a substitute—

That Brigham H. Roberts, having been duly elected a Representative from the State of Utah, with the qualifications requisite for admission to the House as such, is entitled, as a constitutional right, to take the oath of office prescribed for members-elect, his status as a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives, affording constitutional grounds for expulsion, but not for exclusion from the House.

And if the House shall hold with us and swear in Mr. Roberts as a member, we shall, as soon as recognition can be had, offer a resolution to expel him as a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], whose great ability and fairness, as exhibited on this floor, I have often had occasion to admire, offers this amendment to the majority resolution:

Insert, in line 4, page 1, after the word "and," the following: "he is expelled and;" so as to read:

"Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances in this case Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and he is hereby expelled, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant."

These are the three ways presented to the House by any one of which the member from Utah and his polygamous practices will be effectually and finally disposed of so far as this House is concerned.

For one, although coming under the ban of the criticism of some gentlemen here of being a lawyer, I care very little for the technicalities of the law, unless by their invocation some great principle is protected or some great human right is preserved.

The Constitution names the qualifications of a member of this House. He "shall (1) have attained the age of 25 years, (2) been seven years a citizen of the United States, and (3) an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen." These are the qualifications named in the Constitution, and this House, acting alone, has no right to add to or take from these qualifications.

The claimant in this case comes here with a certificate from the governor of his State, declaring him to be possessed of these three requisites to admission, just as every other member came. We are not bound to keep him here. He can be expelled immediately, and will be expelled by a unanimous vote of the House. No man here will vote to hold him here, and whether he sees fit to take the oath or not he will be expelled as quickly as the roll of the House can be called after the adoption of the resolution reported by the minority. We must either accept this view of the matter or we must add another qualification to those prescribed in the Constitution, which instrument, in the light of history, in the light of reason and common sense, excludes any other qualification. Gentlemen say that we must protect Congress from association with this moral leper. Granting the correctness of that proposition, must we not also protect the American people in their right to be represented here? Must we not defend the Constitution, which has been the protecting ægis of our liberties for all these years, from the attack of those who, careless of its safeguards, would bend or break that great instrument to fit every passing fancy or to gratify every momentary desire?

Mr. Speaker, without reflecting on the position of any gentleman here, when I became a member of this House I took an oath to "support the Constitution," and I would be derelict in my duty to myself and a disgrace to my constituency if I had not the moral courage to vote in accordance with my understanding of that Constitution. I voted for the Tayler resolution to stop him at the threshold in the hope that the committee to be appointed thereunder would unanimously agree upon a safe, orderly, and constitutional way to rid the House of the polygamous member from Utah. That hope was a vain one. The committee comes with two widely divergent views, and every member must determine for himself the road he will travel. My own investigation since that time has convinced me that expulsion is the only safe and constitutional remedy, and I have been but more firmly intrenched in that opinion by a careful reading of the majority and minority reports of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I may truthfully say that this debate has been the greatest for years in any legislative assembly in the world. Since its opening, in the strong argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] and the magnificent speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], in my opinion unsurpassed in the history of legislative debates, there has not been a single dull moment. Every speech, on whatever side delivered, has but made me stronger in the belief that expulsion is the only lawful remedy.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has offered an amendment to the majority report which, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, might be common ground for all. Its adoption would, in my opinion, make the vote unanimous for the expulsion of the member from Utah. Then why not adopt it, Mr. Speaker? The majority of the committee favor exclusion. The minority favor expulsion. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] provides for his exclusion without first being seated, and simply adds the requirement that in accordance with the constitutional provision a two-thirds majority be required to exclude. The swearing in of a member is but a technical and perfunctory act, so far as giving the House jurisdiction over him is concerned. While it is a necessary prerequisite to his participation in legislation, it is not prerequisite to the drawing of his salary, the franking of his mail, or his participation in the election of a Speaker.

The mere administration of the oath of office does not change in any wise the relations of a member to his fellow-members; and if it be pollution to sit with the member from Utah long enough to constitutionally expel him, the Congress has been polluted already, for he has been a member since March 4, 1899, performing all the offices and functions and enjoying all the privileges of any other member since that date. It might be, as some gentlemen have claimed in this debate, farcical in the extreme to insist on the mere technical right of swearing in the member before expelling him, if that were all that is involved in the question. But, Mr. Speaker, the great difference, the constitutional difference, the irreconcilable difference, between the majority and the minority reports is this:

The adoption of the majority report requires only a majority of a quorum, which might be only 1 vote more than one-fourth of the membership of the House, to exclude a member-elect from the House. The adoption of the minority report would require two-thirds before a member-elect could be expelled or excluded. That is the difference, Mr. Speaker, and that is why those of us who are supporting the minority report stand as we do. We favor the expulsion of Mr. Roberts, we favor his prompt expulsion, but we favor his expulsion under the law and the Constitution. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that it was the intention of the framers of that great instrument that when a district or a State sends a member here whose election is undoubted and unquestioned by anybody, he should stay here unless the resolution for his expulsion or exclusion should command the "concurrence of two-thirds." Gentlemen say we can not expel for anything which happened before a member's election. Mr. Speaker, there is no limitation on this power, beyond its requirement of a two-thirds vote, but the conscience of an honest and enlightened member of this House.

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

This is the reading of the Constitution, and it seems to me that no strain on the mind or conscience of anyone is required to so understand it. They pretend to be afraid that Roberts may, by some technicality, be permitted to retain his seat, and thus they justify this unconstitutional and revolutionary proceeding. Does anybody believe that, with this House and the country practically unanimous in support of his expulsion, Roberts can hold a seat in this House?

Why, Mr. Speaker, granting, for the sake of argument, that the contention of these gentlemen is true, that he can not be expelled except for conduct after his election, polygamy is a continuing offense, just as marriage is a continuing state. So long as the member from Utah clings to the plural wives which he left behind him in Utah, he is a polygamist and subject to the discipline of this body under the expulsion clause of the Constitution. He is as much a polygamist to-day as he was ten years ago. He is a polygamist now and will be a polygamist morally and legally until he, in good faith, abandons all except that first wife to whom he pledged his troth in the long ago. Every day he lives and continues his marital relations with his second and third wives he is guilty of polygamy. Every day he declines to sever those relations he is guilty of polygamy. And, as I have already said, it will not require a longer time than the calling of the roll of the members of the House to expel him after the adoption of the minority report. As I have also said, Mr. Speaker, believing, as I do, that the only essential right involved in this controversy between the majority and the minority is the requirement by the minority report of a two-thirds vote to put out of this House a man sent here with an unquestioned title, I for one am willing to accept the Lacey amendment.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if a majority can exclude a member for reasons other than those affecting his title, in times of great partisan excitement it might be used to subvert the will of the people of a great State, and even reverse the majority elected to this House. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the minority report, which expels Roberts in the unquestioned constitutional way. If that is defeated, I shall vote for the Lacey amendment, which requires a two-thirds vote to pass it, and thus, while not technically constitutional, preserves inviolate the right of an electorate to send one of its citizens here to stay unless declared unfit by at least two-thirds of the House. In this case there is no doubt, as a two-thirds vote is not only a certainty, but a unanimous vote is equally a certainty if taken in this way. If they both are defeated, I shall regretfully but certainly vote against the majority resolution, because subversive of law and destructive of the rights of the people.

I do not believe this vote inconsistent with my vote on the resolution of inquiry; but if so, I would rather be right than consistent.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. Roberts] was duly elected a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress and has exercised the franking privilege of the postal law, voted for Speaker in the organization of this House, and has enjoyed the emoluments of his office ever since his election. The special committee appointed by the House to investigate the legal status of his case and the facts thereof have disagreed. The majority of the committee have reported for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant.

And the minority proposes the following substitute:

That Brigham H. Roberts, having been duly elected a Representative from the State of Utah, with the qualifications requisite for admission to the House as such, is entitled, as a constitutional right, to take the oath of office prescribed for members-elect, his status as a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives, affording constitutional grounds for expulsion, but not for exclusion from the House.

And if the House shall hold with us and swear in Mr. Roberts as a member, we shall, as soon as recognition can be had, offer a resolution to expel him as a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives.

So that, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of sending the gentleman from Utah away from this House, but it is as to the manner of his going. Not a member of this House doubts that the gentleman from Utah will be allowed to remain a member of this Congress any longer than a decisive vote can be had on his case. I believe that most every gentleman who coincides with the views presented by the minority of the committee would vote against the proposition to permit the gentleman from Utah to retain a seat in Congress. I shall so vote, if the opportunity be presented; but, Mr. Speaker, I can not vote for his exclusion from this body. The Constitution nowhere provides for such a proceeding, and I do not believe that the precedents cited for such action are sound or binding.

No custom, no precedent, can become law unless it be a good custom or precedent. No parliamentary body is bound by precedent, and it certainly ought not to respect a bad precedent. There is no constitutional provision for the exclusion of a member.

Section 2 of Article I of that Constitution declares that—

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

And in regard to the qualification of members it provides:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

In regard to the Constitution I am a strict constructionist rather than a latitudinarian. I believe unless the power invoked is expressly granted, or derived by fair implication from what is expressly granted, that the power does not exist. Mr. Roberts was duly and fairly elected. This is universally conceded. He is 25 years of age, and has been for seven years a citizen of the United States, and when elected was an inhabitant of the State of Utah. I think, therefore, he is entitled to take the oath as a member of Congress.

If he is allowed to take the oath, I shall then, following out the law as found by the minority and the facts as found by the whole committee, vote to expel the member from Utah from this body. I think there is express authority for such action. It is found in Article I, section 5, subdivision 2, of the Constitution, which says that—

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

On this subject I quote from Tucker on the Constitution:

This clause is essential to support the autonomy of each House, and rules for its proceedings, unless opposed to some express provision of the Constitution may be established by each according to its pleasure. These powers are similar to those of the two houses of the British Parliament.

The disorderly behavior for which a member may be punished has been a matter of some conflict of opinion. Must it be for such behavior in the House only, or for misbehavior outside of the House? Blount was expelled from the Senate for an offense inconsistent with public duty, but it was not for a statutory offense, nor was it in his official character nor during the session of Congress nor at the seat of the government. The vote for expulsion was 25 to 1. In the case of Smith, the motion to expel was made against him for supposed conspiracy in the alleged treason of Burr; the vote was 19 to 10, and he was not expelled, but it would seem that a large majority of the Senate thought that the accusation was proper ground for expulsion, though the act was not done in the Senate nor by him as a Senator. Perhaps, from the language of the clause, a member may be punished for disorderly behavior on the floor, or for conduct in the House, or perhaps in the committee room, which produces disorder and disturbs the proceedings and business of the House.

Such punishment, it is obvious, may be inflicted by the majority of the vote of the House. The motion to expel a member may be for disorderly behavior or disobedience of the rules of the House in such aggravated form as to show his unfitness longer to remain in the House; and the cases above cited, as well as the reason of the provision, would justify the expulsion of a member from the House where his treasonable and criminal misconduct would show his unfitness for the public trust and duty of a member of either House. But expulsion, which is an extreme punishment, denying to his constituency the right to be represented by him, can only be inflicted by the concurrence of two-thirds of the House, and not by a bare majority. The requirement of a two-thirds vote for expulsion was inserted as an amendment to the original provision by a vote of ten States, one other being divided. This authority to expel had existed in the House of Commons and was exercised for misconduct on the part of the member during the session of the House, and was extended to all cases where the offense clearly unfitted a member for parliamentary duties.

And Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitation, page 133, says as to the power of this House as to expulsion:

Each House has also the power to punish members for disorderly behavior and other contempts of its authority, and also to expel a member for any cause which seems to the body to render it unfit that he continue to occupy one of its seats.

This power is sometimes conferred in the Constitution, but it exists whether expressly conferred or not. It is a necessary and incidental power, to enable the House to perform its high functions, and is a necessary power to the safety of the state. It is a power of protection. A member may be physically, mentally, or morally unfit; he may be affected with a contagious disease, or insane, or noisy, violent, and disorderly, or in the habit of using profane, obscene, and abusive language. And, independently of parliamentary customs and usages, our legislative houses have the power to protect themselves by the punishment and expulsion of a member, and the courts can not inquire into the justice of the decision or look into the proceedings to see whether opportunity for defense was furnished or not.

There is the doctrine laid down by Mr. Cooley, that the House has power to expel for any cause that in its opinion renders the member unfit to occupy a seat.

I have not had the time to investigate the numerous cases or alleged precedents that have been referred to during this debate. Most of these, it is evident, are not analogous to the case now under consideration; and if they are, this House is just as capable of judging the law of this case or the law of any case as the members of any former Congress. Indeed, the oath which each of us took requires us each to support the Constitution. Each one of us must try this case in foro conscientiæ. No member here is to be lectured on this floor as to what his duty is in dealing with this question. Doubtless every member will vote as his conscience and his best judgment may dictate, and the Constitution will live, the Government survive, society will be preserved, and the member from Utah will go hence, whether exclusion or expulsion be the method. But I think this House is not authorized to add to the constitutional qualifications as to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy that of polygamy in judging of the prima facie rights of a member who has attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who, when elected, was an inhabitant of the State from which he was chosen.

Much has been said in this debate about petitions against the member of Utah, but I believe not a single petition has been received by any member of Congress asking the exclusion of Mr. Roberts. These petitions have uniformly asked for his expulsion and for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting polygamy. I now read a copy of one of the petitions. It is as follows:

To the Hon. ——— ———, Representative-elect of the ——— Congressional district of the State of ——— to the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, legally qualified voters of the said ——— Congressional district of the State of ———, do hereby most respectfully and most earnestly call upon you as our Representative in the Fifty-sixth Congress to use your utmost endeavor and to exhaust all honorable means to secure the prompt expulsion of Mr. B. H. Roberts, of Utah, the avowed polygamist and covenant breaker, from the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of the national Constitution in Article I, section 5, paragraph 2, which reads as follows: "Each House of Congress may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member."

We also do most earnestly and most respectfully call upon you to use your utmost endeavor and to exhaust all honorable means to secure action by the Fifty-sixth Congress proposing an amendment to the national Constitution, and submitting the same to the legislatures of the several States, defining legal marriage to be monogamic, and making polygamy, under whatever guise or pretense, a crime against the United States punishable by severe penalties, including disfranchisement and disqualification to vote or to hold any office of honor or emolument under the United States or any State or Territory therein.

It would seem from these petitions that the laity of the country understand the constitutional provisions relating to this subject better than some of the constitutional lawyers here, with due deference to these lawyers.

Mr. Speaker, I have been much amused by some of the arguments made in favor of exclusion. I will mention two instances. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], who is a very able lawyer, says that "the result in this case must by force of this reasoning (his reasoning) be exclusion or nothing. We are confronted with just that dire necessity." I do not think there is any dire necessity in the case. I think the world will move on, constitutional government survive, and organized society exist long after Roberts and the Roberts case have been forgotten. This same gentleman pronounces an apostrophe to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution:

It is true my friend from Maine yesterday rather flippantly alluded to the general-welfare clause in the Constitution. But I beg to say to him that under that clause promoting the general welfare there has been more legislation that has uplifted the people, that has accomplished the public welfare, than under any other clause in that sacred instrument. And when the people of Utah were called upon to act under the Constitution by electing a Representative to Congress, they owed a duty to all the other people in the country to elect a man, to inaugurate a policy that would minister to the public welfare, and not send a man here that would imperil the very Constitution under which we are living.

It is well settled that the welfare clause of the Constitution is a limitation upon powers that are granted in the Constitution rather than a grant of powers itself. And my friend the able and eloquent member from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] waived aside the law in this case and said:

I am not hairsplitting now, I am not chasing legal technicalities now; I am a layman; I am after facts.

That is exactly what has been the argument of the leader of every mob. This leader generally says, "We have caught the criminal. What's the use of going through legal formality, of respecting legal technicality? It will cause delay, create expense. Let's hang the criminal now. Here's the culprit; here's the rope; there's the tree. Men and patriots, let us do our duty." Such is the dire necessity invoked by the mob, such is the legal technicality abhorred by those who want the facts only and despise legal technicalities.

Mr. Speaker, let us proceed to dispose of this case in an orderly and constitutional way. Let us obey the Constitution and permit the member from Utah, who has been duly elected and who is duly qualified, to take his oath; then let us expel him for his continuous disorderly conduct, continued ever since his election; expel him, because he is now guilty of the disorderly conduct of living in violation of law and of moral sense of this House. Let us stand by the Constitution and the law, and the common sense of the American people will approve our action. [Applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I know it is immaterial whether I speak at length or briefly, or not at all, for the argument in support of the views of the minority was made—made, it seems to me, beyond the reach of refutation, either in the House or outside of it—when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] concluded his masterful speech.

Some will not consider how Roberts should be sent hence, and yet the only thing for consideration is the course of procedure, for all agree that he must go. I wish I could be sure that none insist upon excluding instead of expelling him, in the hope of gaining a mean advantage by forcing some to vote against exclusion, as being unconstitutional, whereas the vote of every member present could be had for expulsion.

It was left for the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], open and bold, upon the third day of this debate, to uncover the real position of not a few—indeed, of dozens—of those who favor exclusion and oppose expulsion. He would get rid of Roberts at the earliest opportunity and by the most expeditious method, without reference to the law or the Constitution.

It must be admitted that this philosophy is not altogether new, and it can not be denied that from time to time, in different sections of our own country, as well as in other parts of the world, it has been tested in cases actually arising in tragedies, real and awful, and not merely in fictions for the moot court or in fancies for the entertainment of those who seek amusement at the playhouses. But the House of Representatives has not yet formally embedded it in its rules, and apparently the Constitution makers did not even think of it. The jurist to whom it is necessary to go for this across-the-law-and-the-Constitution doctrine has not been named, nor has a single one of his long line of harmonious decisions been cited in this discussion. The jurist is Judge Lynch, and his decisions appear occasionally instead of at stated times.

When Judge Lynch decides that a man ought to be hanged, he decides, too, that the method of procedure is immaterial. Law, Constitution, order need not be considered; the thing to do is to hang the man as quickly as possible. Generally Judge Lynch acts because he is impatient of the law's delays or fearful of its miscarriages. I do not know that Judge Lynch ever projected himself into a case at the moment when the sheriff was reaching forth his hand to perform the final act at the scaffold.

And now it has come to pass, in the closing hours of the nineteenth century, in the noonday blaze of civilization, under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, in the representative body of the people, that the real question is, Shall that which is equivalent in principle to lynch law be applied or not applied in this case? Confident as we were when we submitted them that the views of the minority, however they may be regarded here and now, must find safe shelter under the Constitution, an instrument not to be lightly overturned or "whistled down the wind" (to employ a phrase popular in this discussion), those who have argued against us and those who have declaimed in opposition to our contention have confirmed us in the conviction that we are right.

Some gentlemen on the other side have presented with ability, with research, and with learning the view which they entertain. The fact that industry and research and learning and experience and skill have all been invoked in vain to answer the views of the minority and meet the powerful argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] may excuse—aye, from the standpoint of those who favor exclusion, may justify—a resort to the philosophy of Judge Lynch. At all events, under the law, according to the weight of authority, by the test of human reason, by the standard of the Constitution, I submit (and if I do so positively, I do so at the same time modestly) that those views of the minority and the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Maine stand absolutely unshaken, the weakest and most incidental parts of them firm, as if untouched by the opposing arguments, and, of course, unaffected by the irrelevant rhetoric hurled at them.

Perhaps I should not wonder under these circumstances, and yet, Mr. Speaker, I do marvel that it may have been thought necessary for somebody equal to the emergency to make such a speech and such an appeal as came from the able and experienced gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR. I listen to that distinguished statesman always with interest, and very seldom, if ever, with approval. [Laughter.] That he may have, in this House, upon this vote, and before the country, the full benefit of his performance, I wish to invite special attention to it.

The gentleman from Ohio, appearing to argue this case, left the Constitution and the spirit of the law and dropped under the jurisdiction of Judge Lynch when he "congratulated" the gentleman from Maine upon having made so able a defense of Mr. Roberts, citing the Guiteau case and other noted criminal trials for comparison. The gentleman from Ohio knows that the gentleman from Maine addressed himself, as a lawyer and statesman, independent enough to assert his opinion, as well as manly enough to have it, to the real questions involved, without cheap abuse of Roberts, it is true, and without a word of defense or apology for him. He defended Roberts, did he? He made the ablest defense which the gentleman from Ohio ever knew to be made!

How weak must be the cause, how desperate must be the straits, of any man or body of men driven into such a position, upon a matter so solemn, so weighty, as determining the meaning of the Constitution, and deserving so well the best thought and honest judgment of all!

Passing from the gentleman from Ohio and speaking generally, I may say that I would scorn to lend myself to the easy work of piling cheap adjective upon cheap adjective and terms of reproach and abuse upon other terms of reproach and abuse, leveling the whole at anyone so utterly helpless and friendless as Roberts is here, without a solitary champion, defender, or apologist, where every man in the House is ready and waiting to send him from this body, nevermore to return.

I would scorn as beneath the contempt of decent men to try to evoke applause from the thoughtless or the excited by denunciations so easily made and so unnecessary under the circumstances. Let me not leave room here for any carping critic, for some one ready to misrepresent and to do wrong and slow to do right, to say that I sympathize with polygamy. I loathe it as much as do the other members of the House, but I do not deem it necessary, in order to show how good I am, and how I love home and motherhood and wifehood and childhood, to lend myself, outside the constitutional considerations involved and against propriety, to denunciation which is simply cheap abuse, requiring neither ability nor courage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is suggested that if the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] should prevail, all future efforts to deal with Roberts would be nugatory, all would be lost, because, perchance, if the opportunity be given him to be sworn in as a member of the House—the opportunity for which he has contended from the hour of the organization of the House to this moment—perchance he would hie himself away to Utah, and then what would the House do? What a petty difficulty if real; how gauzy when existing in fancy alone! Do gentlemen in their senses candidly believe that any difficulty could arise in that remote and most improbable contingency? What would the House do when the opportunity is given a member-elect to be sworn in and he refuses to take the oath? Vacate his seat instanter, if the House please; not by a two-thirds vote, but by a majority vote. Who doubts that that can be done, or doubts that it would be done in this case, if need be?

But it seems that there is another trouble which harasses some gentlemen. While Roberts, they say, possessed certain rights when he presented himself at the bar of the House, they fancy that those rights have slipped away. It is suggested that though he had a right to be sworn in, possessing the constitutional qualifications and a certificate of election, formal and regular, yet, not having been sworn in, but having been stood aside and the matter referred to a committee of this House to investigate, he now comes back before the House, shorn of rights which the Constitution secures to all. Certainly, it should not be held that one waives a right by persistently asserting it.

Some seem to be troubled with a situation in which I think there is no trouble but that of their imagination. They say that by a very large majority the House decided upon standing Roberts aside and appointing a committee to investigate his case, and to report to the House upon it; and that those who voted for that resolution will be inconsistent now if they vote for the resolution submitted by the minority. According to their view, rending the Constitution is a trifling circumstance compared with that brand of consistency which favors the exit which first attracted the attention of certain persons, groping in the dark.

It seems to me that a very little of the discriminating faculty, exercised to a point much short of weariness, ought to bring one to the conclusion that the question now presented should not be minimized or changed in anyone's mind, on account of his vote to refer Roberts's case to a committee.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and I voted for the resolution under which this committee was appointed. I see nothing inconsistent in voting for that, in the comparative state of ignorance in which we then were, and voting now, in the comparative state of enlightenment in which it seems to me we are, after the investigation made, for the resolution which he and I submit. But if there be any inconsistency in it, I would rather be rated as inconsistent than as cowardly enough, mentally and morally, to tie myself to the error of the past, instead of exercising my judgment and conscience in the light of the present. [Applause.]

Roberts being a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives, how shall we dispose of his case? Let us turn to the Constitution and there learn how we should dispose of it.

The Constitution (Article I, section 2, paragraph 2) provides that—

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

If the qualifications of a Representative in Congress are determined and fixed by the Constitution, then Roberts is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House, since all admit that he was elected, and that he lacks none of the specified qualifications.

In the report of the Committee of Detail, giving the first draft of the Constitution, August 6, 1787 (Madison Papers, etc., volume 5, page 376), this paragraph appears as an independent section, i. e., section 2, Article IV, in these words:

> SEC. 2. Every member of the House of Representatives shall be of the age of twenty-five years at least, shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least three years before his election, and shall be at the time of his election a resident of the State in which he shall be chosen.

In the same draft of the Constitution was section 2 of Article VI, as follows:

> SEC. 2. The Legislature of the United States shall have authority to establish such uniform qualifications of the members of each House with regard to property as to the said Legislature shall seem expedient.

Now, if section 2 of Article IV was not exclusive, if it did not fix absolutely the qualifications of Representatives, why was section 2 of Article VI put into the same draft of the Constitution? What office could it have except to enlarge section 2 of Article IV? And what need could there be for enlarging that section if additions could be made by law or by action of the House alone without enlargement?

Madison was opposed to this section 2 of Article VI—

"as vesting an improper and dangerous power in the Legislature. The qualifications of elector and elected were fundamental articles in a republican government and ought to be fixed by the Constitution. If the Legislature could regulate those of either, it can by degrees subvert the Constitution.

"A republic may be converted into an aristocracy or oligarchy as well by limiting the number capable of being elected as the number authorized to elect. In all cases where the representatives of the people will have a personal interest distinct from that of their constituents, there was the same reason for being jealous of them as there was for relying upon them with full confidence when they had a common interest. This was one of the former cases."

Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out "with regard to property," in order, as he said, "to leave the Legislature entirely at large."

Earlier in the discussion Mr. Dickinson opposed section 2 of Article IV, because it would be exclusive, saying he—

Was against any recitals of qualifications in the Constitution. It was impossible to make a complete one, and a partial one would, by implication, tie up the hands of the legislature from supplying omissions.—Madison Papers, etc., volume 5, page 371.

Mr. Wilson took the same view, saying—

Besides, a partial enumeration of cases will disable the legislature from disqualifying odious and dangerous characters.—Ibid., 373.

The opposition, led by Madison, defeated section 2 of Article VI, and so neither in its original form nor amended, as Morris and others proposed, did it get into the Constitution as finally agreed upon. The citizenship qualification of three years, as it first appeared in section 2 of Article IV, was changed by amendment to seven years.

Then this provision, being agreed upon by the Convention, went, with others likewise adopted, to the Committee of Detail, the most influential member of which was Madison.

This Committee of Detail had no authority to change the meaning of what was referred to them, but only "to revise the style of and arrange" the several parts of the Constitution submitted to them.

The majority of the Roberts committee and others tell us that this section 2 of Article IV, as it went to the committee of detail, specified the only qualifications that could be exacted of one claiming a seat in the House as a Representative-elect. They say that if it had gone into the Constitution as it then was, namely—

Every member of the House of Representatives shall be of the age of twenty-five years at least, shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least seven years before his election, and shall be, at the time of his election, a resident of the State in which he shall be chosen—

there could be no doubt but that Roberts would be entitled to take the oath of office and become a member of the House.

"But," they say, "behold what a change has been wrought!" And they base the right to exclude upon the negative form of expression used in the Constitution:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Why so much stress should be laid upon this change in the form of expression, used to convey precisely the same meaning, I am at a loss to determine. And yet the majority of the committee really rest their whole case upon the supposed radical difference in the meaning of a statement when the affirmative form of expression is used, and the same statement when it is made by a negative form of expression.

Now, let us see whether there is anything but error, demonstrable error, in what our friends upon the other side work out as critics. Let us pick these paragraphs to pieces and then reconstruct them, note the result, and profit by what we learn.

In one we have, first:

Every member of the House of Representatives shall be of the age of twenty-five years at least.

In the other:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years.

Tell me, some of ye wise men, who know more about the meaning of what the fathers said in the Constitution than they themselves knew, pray tell me what you find in one of the clauses which you do not also find in the other. And tell me what is absent from the one that is not absent also from the other. As to age, who that could be excluded under the one could be entitled to admission under the other; and who entitled to admission under the one can be excluded under the other. Not one of you has the hardihood to go into such an analysis, for to do so would be to prove that you are wrong.

Are you any better off when the second clauses are compared and studied? Here they are:

Shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least seven years before his election.

And—

Been seven years a citizen of the United States.

What is the difference here except in phraseology?

And, finally, what is the difference between the concluding clauses, save in form of expression? Will you contend that "inhabitant" means more or less than "resident?"

Considering the clauses separately, nothing can be found in one except what is also found to be in the other and corresponding clause, and everything which is excluded by or from one is likewise found to be excluded by or from the other. Put them all back into their places and point out, if you can, any difference of meaning evolved out of the association.

One place the expression is "at least twenty-five years of age;" in another, "attained to the age of twenty-five years." Neither places an upward or seniority limit, and yet you will not follow your own reasoning to its logical conclusion, for while you claim that qualifications outside of those mentioned in the Constitution may be added, you insist that they can not be as to age, citizenship, or residence. If not, then, on your theory, why not? You can give no reason worthy of the name which will not destroy your entire exclusion theory.

As already observed, Madison was the chief spirit on the Committee of Detail. He contended in the convention that the qualifications of members of Congress ought to be determined and fixed in and by the Constitution, and the convention agreed with him. He regarded the matter as of vital importance, going to the foundation of free government. Is it, then, supposable that, having won the fight in the convention, this great man reversed himself in the Committee of Detail, either intentionally or unwittingly? I think not.

And Hamilton and the others, were they so thick-witted as not to know it, if what they had done in the convention had been undone in the committee of detail? I am glad that I find myself able to read the Constitution and to apply it to the facts of the case before us, without imputing to the illustrious patriots, scholars, and statesmen who made it either ignorance or duplicity.

The majority of the committee appear to hang some hopes upon the name and fame of John Randolph. Upon looking into what they quote from him, in connection with the matter then under consideration, and the disposition made of it, we find that John Randolph's contention, vain then, was that the States could add qualifications to those prescribed by the Constitution for Representatives in Congress. This John Randolph notion has drifted away on the tide of time, and is as dead as John Randolph himself, but, of course, not too dead for those who have resurrected it and are trying to galvanize into it an appearance of life.

Observe, if you please, what the Constitution says about the qualifications of the President:

No person except a natural-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.—Constitution, Article II, section 1, paragraph 4.

Here, again, the negative form of statement is employed; and if "our friends, the enemy," be correct in their contention as to the paragraph concerning the qualifications of Representatives, any number of additional reasonable qualifications (the agency imposing them determining whether they are reasonable) may be prescribed for the Presidency. The same is true respecting Senators, whose qualifications also are stated negatively.

It appears to be the belief of some that another provision of the Constitution has a peculiar effect in supporting the construction of those opposed to us. I refer to this passage from section 5, Article I:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Here members are spoken of in the aggregate, and the power given is to judge of their elections—i. e., to determine whether they were elected, not to elect them; to judge of their returns—i. e., to determine whether the returns are or are not sufficient, in substance and form, to show the result of the election, not to make returns; and to judge of their qualifications—i. e., to determine whether they have or have not the qualifications already prescribed, not to add to or take from the prescribed qualifications.

Under this clause the House has just as much right to elect its members as it has to make any member-elect eligible or ineligible, entitled to admission or not entitled to admission, by changing, either by addition or subtraction, the qualifications definitely prescribed, not for one member at one time, but for all members at all times.

Some insist that as "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," it may be such judge before as well as after the member is sworn in. But if that be true, who will say that before the member is sworn in the House can judge of anything of which it can not judge after the oath of office has been administered?

The question before us is not one of time. It is whether the power to judge is the equivalent of the power to make—whether to judge under existing law is to make law.

Some warrant for the exclusion of a member-elect, possessing all the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, is supposed to reside in the concluding clause of Article VI of that instrument:

No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

Clearly, religious test has reference to religious belief, observance, or affiliation, and some promise under oath with respect thereto for the future. The entire paragraph has relation to qualification by taking the oath of office, and presupposes the election or appointment, as the case may be, of the person to be thus qualified or sworn into office, and that he has been shown to possess the prescribed qualifications, at least to the extent of being entitled to take the oath, the final act, at the conclusion of which he is in office.

The war-time test oath, exacted upon the theory opposed to that for which we contend, was declared unconstitutional, and fell to the ground, with the House rules and House precedents based upon or deduced from it.

Indeed, the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution is proof positive that the doctrine of reconstruction days, that members-elect could be stood aside at the will of a majority, or could be kept out by the exaction of an iron-clad oath, which some of them were unable to take, was without constitutional sanction.

The fourteenth amendment went into effect as part of the Constitution in July, 1868. This is section 3 of it:

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Not only does this constitutional amendment afford most convincing evidence that procedure in either House, such as it authorized, was unauthorized before, but it affords equally strong evidence, in prescribing another or further qualification for membership in either House, that nothing else can be required in the way of qualification except what already was in the Constitution—the requirement respecting age, citizenship, and residence.

Here, then, it appears to me, is the way the matter stands:

The Constitution fixed the qualifications for a Representative by requiring that he shall have attained to the age of twenty-five years; shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen. By section 3 of the fourteenth amendment the further requirement just set forth is made.

Now, how can anything be added to or taken from these qualifications except by another constitutional amendment? How can they be right who insist that such things can be done by statute, or, worse still, by the House without the concurrence of the Senate or the President?

Since those who advocate exclusion as against expulsion find themselves driven to seek shelter behind the Edmunds Act of 1882, a word may be said as to this refuge.

They say the Edmunds Act comes in and plays an important part. Finding that their proposed action can not be predicated upon the Constitution, they may be excusable for flying hither and thither, to this and to that, to make what argument they can upon other things.

They must have been under some stress when they approached this act. I find this stated on page 39 of the report made by the majority of the special committee:

Reading that act [the Edmunds Act] as applicable to this case, eliminating the irrelevant portions, it appears as follows: "No polygamist shall be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument under the United States."

I will now read to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, section 8 of that act, not as rendered by the committee, but as the Congress of the United States made it; and let us see whether they have eliminated "the irrelevant portions" of it:

SEC. 8. That no polygamist, bigamist, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, and no woman cohabiting with any of the persons described as aforesaid in this section, in any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be entitled to vote at any election held in any such Territory or other place, or be eligible for election or appointment to or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument in, under, or for any such Territory or place, or under the United States.

It is clear, I think, that the Edmunds Act can not be pressed into service as a support for the exclusion philosophy without "eliminating" its material parts, as is done in the report of the majority of the special committee. But even then it will not answer.

But once or twice, if at all, and probably not once, does "office" or "officer," as used in the Constitution or the amendments thereto, relate to or embrace a Senator or Representative in Congress. This being true, the Edmunds Act, even "eliminating the irrelevant portions," must fall short of helping out the weak argument into which—not naturally, but with force and violence—it is pushed.

Not only was and is that act, by its own express terms, limited to "any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction," but it can have no application to Utah, the State, or to this Roberts case for another reason, an unanswerable reason. No "Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction" could, in 1882, or now, or ever, have a Representative or Senator in Congress. States only can send Senators and Representatives to Congress. Then, as it was not and is not constitutionally possible for "any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction" to elect a Congressman, it is straining human reason and overtaxing human credulity to call for acceptance of the claim that the Edmunds Act has or can have, or ever was intended to have, any control over or relation to members of Congress or their qualifications.

Stress is laid upon an alleged "compact" between Utah and the United States, and the House is gravely urged to punish Utah by excluding Roberts, instead of dealing with Roberts, as the duly elected Representative from Utah, by expelling him because he is a polygamist.

The United States never asked Utah not to elect Roberts or such men as he as Representatives in Congress, and Utah never promised not to elect him or them. All that the United States demanded of Utah, and that as a condition precedent to her admission into the sisterhood of States, was and is that the people of Utah should put into the constitution of the prospective State an express prohibition against polygamy. What the United States demanded that Utah should put into her constitution went into that constitution and is in it to-day, in the precise words of the Congress of the United States.

Utah did exactly what she was required to do, and now she is one of the forty-five States of the Union, upon a complete equality under the Constitution of the United States with each and every other State.

It was suggested in argument by the able gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCPHERSON] that the Supreme Court, in Texas vs. White, reported in 7 Wallace, upheld the "compact" doctrine for which he and other exclusionists contend. An examination of that case I think will show that the court expressly repudiated that doctrine. The court said:

When, therefore, Texas became one of the United States, she entered into an indissoluble relation. All the obligations of perpetual union and all the guaranties of republican government in the Union attached at once to the State. The act which consummated her admission into the Union was something more than a compact, it was the incorporation of a new member into the political body. And it was final.

As my colleague from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] said, the question of whether the relation of a State to the Union is a compact or contract—and the words are the same in significance—dissoluble by either party to the contract upon what to that party shall seem proper ground for dissolution, was settled upon the battlefield in four years of dreadful war, when, as he stated, hundreds of thousands of the bravest and best of American citizens went down to death upon either side.

And now, at this late day, we have exploited here in this Chamber the proposition that there is a special and peculiar contract existing between the United States and Utah, and that the House of Representatives, to the exclusion of the Senate and the President, has the power, derived from the Constitution of the United States, to discipline and punish the people of Utah for an alleged violation of that contract, by excluding from this House the man who was elected a Representative in this Congress from Utah.

That the House has the constitutional right to expel Roberts on the ground that he is a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives, is a proposition which, in my judgment, can not only be sustained by argument but may be established with little, if anything, short of the certainty of a demonstration in mathematics.

The Constitution (Article I, section 5, paragraph 2) provides that—

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

This provision originally appeared in the Constitution, in section 6 of Article VI, in words and with punctuation as follows:

Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings; may punish its members for disorderly behavior; and may expel a member.

These clauses were distinct; separated by semicolons. Each was complete in itself and independent of the others. Who could claim, with any reason, that the power of expulsion as expressed in the words "and may expel a member" was limited or qualified? Certainly the members of the Constitutional Convention understood it to be without limit or qualification. Note what leading ones said when it was under consideration:

Mr. Madison observed that the right of expulsion (Article VI, section 6) was too important to be exercised by a bare majority of a quorum, and in emergencies of faction might be dangerously abused. He moved that "with the concurrence of two-thirds" might be inserted between "may" and "expel."

Mr. Randolph and Mr. Mason approved the idea.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris. This power may be safely trusted to a majority. A few men, from factious motives, may keep in a member who ought to be expelled.

Mr. Carroll thought that the concurrence of two-thirds at least ought to be required.

On the question requiring two-thirds in cases of expelling a member, ten States were in the affirmative; Pennsylvania divided.—Madison Papers, volume 5, page 406.

The article as amended was then agreed to unanimously, and went to the Committee of Detail, to be put into better English, if possible, but not to be changed in the least in meaning. It came from the Committee of Detail and went into the final draft of the Constitution as it now appears, as the second paragraph of the fifth section of the first article of that instrument. To read into it now any limitation or qualification is to impeach either the honor or the capacity of those who framed the Constitution.

John Quincy Adams, the "Old Man Eloquent," expressed very happily what we now, humbly following the fathers, believe:

By letter of the Constitution the power of expelling a member is given to each of the two Houses of Congress, without any limitation other than that which requires a concurrence of two-thirds of the votes to give it effect.

How striking is the fact that our opponents find it necessary to enlarge the provision of the Constitution concerning the qualifications of members of Congress to enable them to exclude a member-elect, and to limit and impair the power of expulsion, without constitutional warrant, while we are quite willing to rest our contention upon the Constitution as it is!

It is insisted that the power to expel is but an enlargement of the power to punish "for disorderly behavior." In other words, that the two clauses are so closely connected, being separated by a comma only, that "disorderly behavior" is the specified ground for expulsion as for punishment. We have seen, by reference to the proceedings of the Convention which framed the Constitution, how foundationless is this contention. Those who make it seem to realize this; for having, by a criticism resting upon a comma, arrived at the conclusion that the power to expel is confined by the Constitution to cases of "disorderly behavior"—aggravated cases, they say—they abandon their chosen position and add cases of misdeeds done in the capacity of a member. This not being sufficient, they add cases affecting the standing of a member, and even this not being enough, they include cases affecting the honor and dignity of the House, and so on to the end of the chapter.

Now, if "disorderly behavior" is the only ground of expulsion provided by the Constitution—and that they proclaim—then these gentlemen run some risk of making themselves ridiculous when they wantonly add other grounds. If the other grounds of expulsion exist under the Constitution, then "disorderly behavior" is not the only constitutional ground therefor.

But having contradicted themselves and refuted their own arguments and destroyed their own interpretation of the Constitution, hung upon a comma, they assume a thus-far-and-no-farther air, and declare that the power of expulsion can not reach a member on account of anything done before his term as Representative began. This is a fresh abandonment of the "disorderly behavior" limitation. The Matteson case is relied on to support this contention. Matteson resigned to escape expulsion from the House in the Thirty-fourth Congress, and the House in the Thirty-fifth Congress did not expel him for the past offense, apparently considering that the former House had dealt with him.

It is not too harsh, and certainly warranted by the facts, to say of the cases of Oakes Ames and others mixed up in the Crédit Mobilier scandal that the offenders were "whitewashed;" not entirely, it is true, but as completely as circumstances would permit. The greatest and best men in the House favored expulsion, and the people doomed to political death some, at least, of the offenders.

The real reason why it is so seldom that expulsion is resorted to for offenses committed before the election of the offender is that the people have a right to elect anybody not disqualified by the Constitution, and that, respecting this sacred right, it rarely happens that the offending is of such a nature or the individual such a person that an exercise of the power of expulsion really is called for.

The power to expel is a power to purge the House of a member who should not remain in it, rather than a power to punish. The courts and the executive are charged with the duty of punishing those guilty of crime whereof they have been duly convicted.

In a well-considered case in Massachusetts—the Hiss case—it is held that the power to expel is an inherent, necessary power, possessed by all legislative bodies, without any constitutional grant. It exists for the protection of the body, not for the punishment of the offender. I believe many persons fall into error and remain in error in consequence of regarding expulsion as punishment instead of protection and purification.

The "disorderly behavior" for which the House may inflict punishment is that which disturbs its proceedings, or interferes with the transaction of its business in an orderly way.

Our friends on the other side are fond of supposing cases. Let us suppose one or two.

Suppose a Representative is and for years has been the chief of a band of forgers, but not a thing can be said against his demeanor while a member or as a member. Suppose, further, that a dozen of his gang also are members, the equals in deportment of their chief. Now, is the House without constitutional power to rid itself of them by expulsion?

Suppose a member of the House, gentlemanly in behavior and devoted to his duties as a member, is one of a band of burglars with whom, when and only when no Congressional duties are to be discharged, he operates as a housebreaker. Is there constitutional power to expel him?

The right of admission to the House is to be determined according to legal principles, and the right of expulsion according to equitable principles—that is, if the Constitution shall be respected. As to expulsion, nothing save the requirement of a two-thirds vote and the judgment and conscience of each individual member can control, influence, or limit action. As to the question of admission or exclusion, the straight lines of constitutional requirement can not be effaced otherwise than through a violation of the supreme law of the land.

The general-welfare clause of the Constitution is invoked to excuse the proposed exclusion of Roberts, who ought to be expelled. I will not contest the proposition, that when a power is granted in and by the Constitution, the incidental powers necessary to make the grant operative, go with it; but that doctrine has no application in this case. The question here is as to original, primary power, and not as to incidental power.

Indeed, our brethren of the other side have only furnished another instance of resorting in desperate cases to the doctrine that "The end justifies the means."

How comforting should be the assurance of these gentlemen, oft repeated, that the action which they recommend—the exclusion of Roberts, though duly elected and possessing all the qualifications which the Constitution requires of any Representative—will not be regarded as a precedent and so will not work harm in the future! Why do they solace themselves with the prediction that what they insist upon having done in this case will not be considered as establishing a precedent to influence the action of future Houses?

Can any plausible reason be given, except that they realize that what they are about to do others ought not to do? If confident that they are right, they ought to hope and pray that they might make a precedent for all hereafter to accept and follow.

Despite these apologetic assurances of these gentlemen, I can not banish the fear that what they advocate will, if accomplished, make a precedent for much wrong-doing. If Roberts may be excluded, instead of being expelled, because he is a polygamist, then others may be excluded at any time for anything that a majority may consider sufficient under the temptations of the hour or the exigencies of party.

In the same breath that brings us the assurance, suggested by conscience, that the excluding of Roberts will not be regarded as a precedent, we are urged to exclude him because, perchance, some other House—not this one—may find itself able to muster a majority, but not two-thirds of its members, against an obnoxious person, elected by the people of his district! Is not this an argument, so called, for making the precedent which (they also say) will not do harm because it will not be regarded as a precedent?

One is reminded of what Shakespeare says about conscience making cowards of us all; but not to the exclusion of the suggestion that upon some other agencies may operate to the same end.

It is claimed in the report of the majority and in argument upon the floor "that if a vote to declare the seat vacant is sustained by a two-thirds majority, the Constitution is substantially complied with."

Everything which the Congress or either House can do at all can, unless a two-thirds vote is required by the Constitution, be done by a majority of a quorum as effectually, and with the like constitutional sanction, as if done by unanimous vote, with every member present and voting. Either a majority of a quorum can constitutionally exclude or declare a seat vacant or all the members can not do it constitutionally.

Some commentators upon the Constitution support, generally by implication, some of the minor points in the contention of the exclusionists, and straightway these gentlemen parade with ropes in their hands, if not with masks upon their faces. But the great weight of authority is against their contention and in support of ours, as I think fully appears by the two reports.

The fertile imagination of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] leaped over the narrow bounds within which is confined the evidence taken in this particular case and ranged at will through newspaperdom, borne abroad on the wings of rumor, and appealed to "the jury." No man has more respect than I have for the jury system or for the verdict of the jury. The court instructs the jury as to what the law is. The Constitution, to support which we have taken an oath, instructs us as to what is the supreme law in these United States. The facts, so far as they have significance and importance here, appear in the testimony as it has been reported to this House.

One might wake the echoes on the stump, or gain the applause of the galleries, or be cheered on by the enthusiastic outbursts of sympathetic members upon the floor, when he goes abroad beyond the record, exercises his inventive ingenuity, and lets himself loose to his full capacity in denunciation and romance. Of course, it is with each gentleman to determine for himself whether he will cast his vote in this matter under the Constitution and upon the facts, or upon the broad principles of general goodness, which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] will have us understand that he enunciated, outside the record and beyond the pale of the testimony.

One reason for the exclusion of this man contrary to the Constitution is that he is said to have vilified or sneered at Miss Helen Gould. Did he? Let us see how much of sneer or vilification is in what he did say. Speaking of her he said:

> I mention that lady's name with the profoundest respect and admiration for her good works, her womanly charity, and, withal, her broad-mindedness, and only regret that she has been misled in relation to the conditions in Utah.

I am not here, as my colleague [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] was not here, to defend Mr. Roberts or to apologize for him. But if there be either sneer or vilification in Roberts's language of respect and admiration concerning Miss Gould, where are the bounds to ordinary truthfulness and ordinary regard for propriety upon this floor?

I too have admiration for Miss Helen Gould and commendation for the good that she has done. Only a few days ago I had a pathetic letter from a childless widow dwelling in my own district, whose husband fought under Lee and Jackson. Weakened and broken with wounds, he crossed over the river to "rest under the shade of the trees" with the chieftain whom he followed in many hard-fought battles. He left one child, the son of the father's pride, the mother's hope and joy.

They were poor, and the boy was the stay of the mother's declining years, her prop as the weight of age gathered upon her and the infirmities incident to life increased. The Spanish war came on. Burning in his soul was the same martial fire that blazed in the soul of his sire; the youth was one of the first to volunteer to fight under the old Star Spangled Banner, waving again in glory over a united country, a noble people. In the service he contracted disease and suffered injuries from which about a week ago he, too, crossed over the river, to "rest under the shade of the trees." That boy gave his life, that mother gave more than life, to our country, and they are but types of thousands.

So, while admiration may go to your Helen Goulds, while praise may sound the land over for those who from their great abundance give a pittance, and while I may join in the acclaim, yet to me, here and elsewhere, there is a higher glory which belongs to the poor and the lowly for their services, sacrifices, and sufferings. There is the holy sacrifice of the mother who gives up her only son to her country's cause; the sacrifice of the sister, from the humble walks of life, if you please, who sees the idolized brother go forth, a soldier with his shield upon his arm, to return—ah, who can tell how?—with it or upon it! And the sweet angels of mercy who humbly, but with a tenderness little less than divine, minister to sick, wounded, and dying—who trumpets to fame these devoted daughters of the plain people!

There is an unsung nobility from the walks of private life, in the humble retreats of common citizenship, which brings from my heart and out of my soul a meed of praise, and if I had the power, would call forth a paean of glory that would sound far above all the adulation offered to wealth, that contributes of its abundance without sacrifice and with the certainty of glory to attend. [Applause.]

The able gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] draws upon his fancy for pictures with which, perhaps, he may frighten some whom his argument fails to convince into supporting him in his determination to exclude Roberts. For instance, he draws the curtain and discloses to us, revealed upon the background of his imagination, the picture of a member-elect who admits that he was a traitor to his country, fighting in the army of Spain against his native land; and by his side is projected the figure of a most reputable witness, who swears to the truthfulness of the shameful confession. The traitor, the gentleman from Ohio says, can not be convicted, because there is but one witness to his treason, and the Constitution requires two. Then, deeply distressed in contemplating the horror of his own imagining, this gentleman reaches one of his climaxes by demanding information as to whether anyone believes the House could not protect itself by excluding the monster!

Now, does he really fear that the House would not promptly expel his champion culprit? If not, the awful gravity of the case does not put it beyond the efficacy of constitutional treatment.

But suppose the man manufactured for the occasion by the gentleman from Ohio does not admit his guilt, and suppose further that the other man does not swear that he is guilty. Still, a majority may exclude, and the gentleman's argument, and the action of the House if it shall follow him, will stand as an authoritative declaration that the right to do so exists under the Constitution.

Other cases are "supposed," for use as object lessons. Suppose an insane man appears and asks to be allowed to take the oath of office? What power, we are asked, but that of exclusion, can then be invoked? And the case of Senator Niles, of Connecticut, is cited.

It was said that Niles was deranged, and the Senate appointed a committee to ascertain whether he possessed the mental capacity to understand the obligation of the oath of office. The committee reported that he had such capacity, and he was sworn in as a member of the Senate. That procedure seems to be adapted to such cases; and how different it is from the exclusion of a sane man who does comprehend what it is to take an oath of office!

And what of the case of the man with a contagious disease?

If you admit him to the floor of the House, the danger from his presence would not be materially increased by swearing him in and at once expelling him, if he would not at once voluntarily retire and keep away until no longer thus afflicted. But why should anyone be suffered to enter any public building or to go at large at all while in a condition to scatter disease far and wide? Ordinary police regulations are quite sufficient for such cases; the Constitution need not be broken to meet them.

And then there is the case of the imaginary being, who swears and howls and fires pistol bullets at the portraits on the walls, demanding all the while that the oath of office be administered to him. "How can you deal with him," these naive gentlemen inquire, "if the constitutional power to exclude Roberts does not exist?"

Who that will refresh himself with a moment of calm, absolutely free from hysteria, can doubt that the presiding officer would at once direct the arrest of the offender, whether member, member-elect, or anyone else, if other officers of the body or employees or members did not at once perform that necessary service? And then the offender would be turned over to the jailer and the courts or would be punished by the House itself.

And the member-elect confined in the penitentiary for a period covering the entire life of the Congress, or expiring only the day before the final adjournment of the Congress—how can he be dealt with, if it be not in order under the Constitution to exclude Roberts instead of expelling him? This is another sample conundrum, supplied by the exclusionists.

Note the difference between the case at bar and the supposed case: Roberts is not in the penitentiary, but is here claiming a seat in the House as a Representative-elect; the other fellow is not here claiming a seat and can not be here. No one denies the power or right of the House by a majority vote to declare vacant a seat which a member-elect will not or can not take, as it is his duty to do; and thus disappears another lion spirited from dreamland and thrown into the pathway of the Constitution.

Let it be observed now, once for all, that not a single argument has been advanced for the majority report which is not more potent for expulsion than for exclusion.

The "anti-contamination" plea is mirth provoking. Some gentlemen affect much concern lest we be "contaminated" if the oath of office be administered to Roberts, even though he be then expelled just as quickly as the roll could be called upon the adoption of the resolution to expel. They know very well that from the 4th day of December until this hour Roberts has been privileged to come into this House and remain in it at will. They know that during all the time since this House convened in December he has had a seat and a desk upon this floor, the same as each of them. In view of these facts, known to everyone here, the anti-contamination plea for leave to lay aside the Constitution may go to join its fellows.

Often I have been impressed with a display of the depth of the wisdom of the plain, common-sense people of our land. Indeed, I rate their homely judgment, evolved from the everyday thought of the millions, as worth much more than the conclusions of the supposed wise men, titled or in official station. This case, I think, affords an example in point.

Millions of good, conscientious, God-loving, God-fearing people who petitioned us for action in this Roberts case, prayed us to expel him! Here is the prayer that came to us, in thousands of petitions, signed by millions of devoted Christians:

To the Hon. ——— ———, Representative-elect of the ——— Congressional district of the State of ——— to the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, legally qualified voters of the said ——— Congressional district of the said State of ———, do hereby most respectfully and most earnestly call upon you as our Representative in the Fifty-sixth Congress to use your utmost endeavor and to exhaust all honorable means to secure the prompt expulsion of Mr. B. H. Roberts, of Utah, the avowed polygamist and covenant breaker, from the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provision of the National Constitution in Article I, section 5, paragraph 2, which reads as follows: "Each House [of Congress] may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

We also do most respectfully and most earnestly call upon you to use your utmost endeavor and to exhaust all honorable means to secure action by the Fifty-sixth Congress proposing an amendment to the National Constitution, and submitting the same to the legislatures of the several States, defining legal marriage to be monogamic, and making polygamy, under whatever guise or pretense, a crime against the United States, punishable by severe penalties, including disfranchisement and disqualification to vote or to hold any office of honor or emolument under the United States or any State or Territory therein.

How fine is the intuition of the American citizen when his honest mind is moved and his Christian conscience is stirred! Our modest, unassuming constituents must have appreciated more than some of us do that while the polygamist should be cast out, he should go hence as the Constitution has ordained—by expulsion. They seem to realize that the preservation of the Constitution is of vital importance to them and theirs. When they ask for bread, why give them a stone?

Much has been said about the protection of the House. A word about the protection of the people. They have the right to elect as their Representative in Congress whomsoever they choose. If the person elected possess the prescribed qualifications, the refusal to admit him to a seat in the House is a deadly blow at the representative government of a free people. Every member is elected subject to the constitutional right of the House to expel him for anything which, by a two-thirds vote, is declared to be a sufficient reason for the exercise of the power to expel. Both the House and the people will be best protected when the constitutional rights of the humblest or most odious claimant of a seat in the House are respected and preserved.

Mr. Speaker, I have consumed more of the time of the House than I meant to take, and I have been listened to with that close and respectful attention for which, I assure you and assure the House, I am profoundly grateful. I shall close with my humble but heartfelt tribute to the Constitution, that incomparable work of the Revolutionary patriots, which has commanded the admiration of the noblest of men from the day of its creation until this hour; has compelled the commendation, almost the worship, of independent free men everywhere.

Matchless instrument! Mighty chart of human freedom! Splendid tribute to human genius! Invaluable guardian and surety of the safety of the Republic and of the perpetuity of the liberties of millions and millions of American citizens, now and in all the coming years and ages! Who need fear for being faithful to it? Who need be frightened from it? Who need apologize for standing by it and cleaving to it, whatever may happen, whatever timidity may suggest? Long after all of us shall have passed from this scene of action and from this stage of existence; when the very stones that mark the places of our long rest shall have crumbled; when our names and our deeds, good or bad, great or small, shall have faded from the memory of man, people of greater enlightenment, aspiring to higher glories of citizenship, excelling in nobler triumphs of liberty, will revere that sacred instrument.

But, however this House may vote, whatever the procedure in this case may be, while I live, and during the lives of my children after me, I and they at least will cherish the proud recollection that I stood by the Constitution as the fathers made it and as the fathers interpreted it; and whether many or few of you vote to sustain the view advanced by my friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and me, whether that view be vindicated or go down—aye, were not a man to sustain it but us two—we will stand by it proudly, and will welcome and cheerfully abide by the judgment of our constituents. And in our small way, and our brief day in history, we shall expect that the majority of the thoughtful men of our own profession, and of the broad-minded people of this land generally, at least such of them as may have occasion to look into this question and consider it, will be found with us.

He who stands by the Constitution, especially when there is no temptation to overturn it, no war spirit rife, no bitter prejudice, no division of the parties, the Democrat on one side and the Republican on the other—he who stands by the Constitution then certainly stands upon solid ground. And he who departs from it then can not have the excuse, or the justification, if you please, of the stress of troublous times, of the might of a swelling wave of passion and prejudice, or the urgency of necessity.

Calmly, unnecessarily, inexcusably, he will, so far as in him lies, have trodden under foot the noblest instrument ever given by man to man, to band together and hold together free men and free States in their triumphal march, onward through the years and through the centuries, to a loftier civilization and a mightier destiny, not only for our Republic, but for the people of the world. And so, whatever the decision may be, however you may align yourselves in this contest, throwing aside personal feelings, we will gladly stand with the Constitution if it is to be upheld, and will proudly, though in sorrow, go down with it if it is to be crushed. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I appear in behalf of the highest privilege of this great House of the People, and if there ever was a necessity for a rational exercise and emphatic assertion of its supreme prerogative, that occasion is now upon us. If I know my own heart, I love the Constitution of my country and the institutions of my Government and would not wittingly do either of them the slightest violence. I have no sympathy with and am no apologist for Judge Lynch or any of his methods, about which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has said so much. I can not bring myself to believe that the Constitution requires or that the country expects the House of Representatives to do anything absurd or ridiculous. I can not drive away the thought from my mind that if Mr. Roberts shall be sworn into this House and then immediately expelled, it will be an illogical and inconsistent procedure.

Let me impress upon the attention of members one thought at the very outset. Those of us who vote for exclusion will do so essentially because Mr. Roberts is a polygamist. Those of you who may vote for expulsion will cast that vote, when you carefully introspect and analyze your real motives, because of the fact that he is a polygamist. Let us not deceive ourselves. If we who vote for exclusion shall thereby impose, as is contended, a disqualification not specifically mentioned in the Constitution, we shall do it openly and avowedly. Those of you who vote for expulsion, and for the very same cause that actuates us, will also be adding a disqualification not prescribed in the Constitution, and while tacit and undeclared the reason may be, it will nevertheless amount to the same thing. Expulsion, according to Story and the weight of authority and precedents, seems to be authorized only on account of extreme "disorderly behavior" or criminal conduct by a member during the period of his membership, or in some way related to his status as a member, and not for something done antedating his membership. Of what possible disturbance of the House or infraction of its rules or outrageous crime could Mr. Roberts be guilty in the brief interval between swearing him in and forthwith turning him out, as proposed by the minority of the committee?

Every deliberative body should, and I believe does, possess the inherent right to uphold and protect itself in its dignity, its integrity, and its reputation. If unexpressed by its charter, this right would arise and result by necessary implication as a logical consequence.

Every body of men peaceably assembled for a lawful purpose should, and I believe does, have the primary authority in its organization and conduct, to determine and enforce the rules and regulations by which it is to be governed and through which it is to attain its purpose.

The great first law of order naturally attaches to every correct human association. It were folly for men to meet for any proper reason, unless there should reside in those constituting the meeting, some authority to regulate the proceedings and some jurisdiction to promote and accomplish in an orderly manner the object of such meeting. In recognition of this inherent power and natural course of things, the Constitution of the United States provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Neither the time, nor the method, nor the general character of such determination is prescribed.

These things are wisely and amply confided to each House. In keeping with this provision, it has been maintained from time immemorial, and, so far as I know, without controversy, that "questions of privilege shall be first—those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings." This is, I believe, the greatest rule of the House of Representatives, and is made under the warrant of the Constitution, and, so long as it exists, has all the sanction and binding force of the Constitution itself upon those whose duty it is to observe it. While this has been formulated into a well-accepted and long-standing rule of the House of Representatives, and has been uniformly observed and respected, nevertheless I think the privilege so defined and the power for its appropriate enforcement, from the very necessity of the case, would appertain and be vested in the House even were there no such rule declared.

In the language of a great judge, this—

Power is inherent, incidental, and necessary, and must exist in every aggregate and deliberative body in order to the exercise of its functions, and because without it such body would be powerless to accomplish the purposes of its constitution.

Again:

It is a power of protection, and is necessary to the safety of the state.

I believe that I may safely go further and say that were the Constitution absolutely silent touching the right of the House to "determine the rules of its proceedings," it would still have the right to do any act and make any rule which might be "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power" belonging to it by virtue of its creation and existence.

If at the threshold, or during the primary stages of its organization, or at any time, the House should find itself confronted with any condition which would be reasonably calculated to injuriously affect "its rights, safety, dignity, or the integrity of its proceedings," would it not be competent, as well as suitable, to promptly advertise the situation and investigate the matter in limine? It is not difficult to imagine cases which might menace the House and warrant such action.

Suppose, for example, and it is an old and familiar one, that a person afflicted with a serious and contagious disease, or one guilty of treason, or one fraudulently impersonating a Representative-elect, or a maniac breathing out threatenings and wrath, or one in the frenzy of delirium tremens, or one so intoxicated as not to understand the consequences of his acts, or one who had on the morning of the assembling of Congress maliciously taken the life of his fellow-man, in either case, should, at the time of the swearing in of members, present himself and insist upon then and there having the oath administered to him by virtue of a certificate of election, will it be contended that, upon the solemn protest and responsible charge of a member of the House, acting upon his knowledge or information and belief as to the facts, such a person could not be required to stand aside until an inquiry could be had?

To make a more pertinent, modern, and perhaps a more interesting illustration, suppose that there had been an election held in our alleged antipodal possessions, the Philippine Islands, to select a Delegate to Congress, and that, coming with a certificate of election issued by the proconsul, or whoever might be the proper party to sign a commission, there should appear the Sultan of Jolo, fresh from his seraglio, hailing from the archipelago, claiming an imperium in imperio, accompanied by his chief dato, armed with his bolo [great laughter and applause], and demand that he be sworn in as a Territorial Delegate, should we not exclude him, if the facts which have been alleged against him had been ascertained to be true? Upon the theory of the minority, perhaps the proper procedure would be to say to him, "Will your royal highness kindly come down to the bar of the House and have the oath administered?" and then kick him out. [Renewed laughter.] Under our theory, we would say to him at the threshold, "You keeper of an oriental harem, 'Avaunt, and quit our sight!'" [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

It may be urged that these cases are conjectural and improbable to arise, but they and others that have been cited and might be supposed will serve to illustrate the absurdity of limiting and circumscribing the House of Representatives in the proper exercise of an inherent power. In either of the cases mentioned, it would clearly be the duty of any member of the House having knowledge or well-grounded belief of the facts, to acquaint the House therewith and protest accordingly; and it seems to me that it would be unreasonable for the House to deny itself or be denied the privilege of asserting adequate power to protect and safeguard itself against such impending injury and trouble; otherwise, there would be presented the strange and grotesque anomaly of an independent body being ridiculously helpless and impotent to defend itself or maintain its dignity and respectability; and the House of Representatives, authorized by the Constitution, would be deprived of the power to vindicate its distinctive function as a deliberative assembly or determine and enforce its procedure.

While it may be admitted that a person bearing a regular certificate of election as a member of Congress, issued by the proper authority, has the prima facie right to appear and be sworn in, and so long as such right is undisputed and no opposing evidence is offered, is entitled to every privilege and favorable presumption which such certificate implies and carries with it, nevertheless there may exist facts and conditions which will, at least for the time being, rebut the prima facie case. Not all presumptions are conclusive; some are disputable and may be negatived. "Stabit presumptio donec probetur in contrarium" is a maxim well recognized in law and of common acceptation.

Mr. Speaker, for some reasons I desire to submit a brief historical résumé of this case. Mr. Roberts appeared in the House and bore in the form of his certificate of election, a prima facie or presumptive right to take the oath as a member thereof, and presented himself for the execution and enjoyment of that right; but simultaneously therewith, a duly accredited and qualified member of this House [Mr. TAYLER of Ohio] arose in his place, interposed an objection (in which he was joined by as good a man as ever sat in this House, or will ever sit in any future Congress, my friend from Arkansas, Mr. MCRAE), and with solemnity declared that—

It is charged that Brigham H. Roberts, a Representative-elect to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives, and that such charge is made through a member of this House on his responsibility as such member, and on the basis, as he asserts, of public records, affidavits, and papers evidencing such ineligibility.

This charge was manifestly preferred in good faith, and not through caprice or partisan prejudice, and evidently with no sinister or selfish motive; for it must be admitted as historically true that every member of the House had for months, and continuously, been put upon notice of the facts out of which the charge arose, as well as the gravity of its nature, and hence realized the sincerity with which the accusation was made. Had there been the slightest suspicion to the contrary, it was within the province of any member of the House to have demanded the production and called for the reading of the records, affidavits, and papers the existence of which had been affirmed. It was known and published in advance just what action was contemplated in the Roberts case and why it was to be taken. "None of these things were hidden," nor were they "done in a corner."

Here we have the certificate of election, with all its supporting presumptions; in other words, the prima facie case on the one side, and on the other the objections and the accompanying statements of two reputable members of the House, fortified with the most extensively circulated notice and general information bearing upon the allegations, coming as they did through the press, metropolitan and rural, personal correspondence, pamphlets, public meetings, petitions, protests, and every channel of notification—everything and in every way calculated to put reasonable men on inquiry, to challenge their attention, and elicit their investigation, as well as to carry conviction as to a substantial foundation for the charges made. No such case, with all its antecedent discussion and publicity, had ever occurred; a similar one will never likely arise in the future. It is notably sui generis.

In the light of all these facts and circumstances, with a caveat continental in its scope and character, was not the prima facie case rebutted, and was not the presumptive right involved so impaired and discredited as to justify the House of Representatives of the American Congress, in the exercise of its sound discretion and inherent power, in at least holding in abeyance the claim urged by Mr. Roberts for his immediate admission to that great body, and instituting, through its own agency and under its own direction, an investigation of the matters in issue?

It is certainly constitutional for the House to "judge of the qualifications of its own members." When, where in its proceeding, and how shall that judgment be employed? Are not the right to judge, and the reasoning by which a conclusion shall be reached, and the entire mental modus operandi, absolutely and in all they imply, conclusively reposed and vested in the House of Representatives?

The prerogative of the aggregate body, independent of its expressed and clearly implied constitutional warrant, could surely be invoked and reasonably asserted to such an extent as to render an interlocutory judgment, and to say to the insistent Representative-elect, "We will pause and consider. We will investigate and ascertain." It does not appear that there could result any serious lesion to the Constitution or any essential deprivation of the rights of the member-elect present, or the constituency behind him, if there should be a temporary deferment and consequent inquest; nor does it seem that when the House said to Mr. Roberts, "You may stand aside for the present, in order that we may have time and opportunity to inquire and judge and determine concerning the issue raised," there was anything harshly arbitrary in its action or abusive of its constitutional province and jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, the framers of the Constitution were men of great wisdom, and the whole world honors them, and I respect their handiwork, I am sure, fully as much as does my friend who has last spoken. It will stand while the ages endure. While they had the loftiest conceptions of the principles of popular government, and "builded better than they knew," they were withal men of the strongest order and the best qualities of common sense. They were practical men. They never contemplated for one moment that their work or any part of it should lead to or cause the operation of any absurdity.

When they said, "There shall be a House of Representatives, that it shall choose its Speaker and other officers, that it shall judge, that it may compel the attendance of absent members under such penalties as it may prescribe, that it may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish or expel a member, and keep a Journal," they did not intend that these were all and the only things that the House should or might do. They never designed that a great organic, legislative body should be incapable of its own conservation or that the specific enumeration of the powers and duties mentioned, should exclude other privileges, authority, or details of procedure which, by fair inference and in the very nature of things, must attend and belong to such an organization in its collective capacity. It would discredit their good sense and do violence to every reasonable intendment and the contemporaneous parliamentary usage and government then obtaining among the civilized nations of the world, and especially the mother country, to suppose that it was their purpose to shear the House of Representatives of its power of self-protection and the maintenance of its dignity, safety, integrity, and representative character. This is clearly deducible from that section of the Constitution which declares that "The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

To create a House logically carries with the act of creation every necessary and proper authority in and attaching to such House. I therefore conclude—and I will be ingenuous enough to say, in opposition to my preconceived or prima facie opinion, formed without elaborate research and reflection—that under all the circumstances, it was competent for the House of Representatives to interdict as it did the claim of Mr. Roberts to be sworn in as a member of this House and to pursue the course and pass the resolution which it adopted on the 5th of December, 1899, and that his prima facie right to have the oath instantly administered to him was accordingly rebutted.

It will be remembered that each of the resolutions offered in the House in relation to the Roberts case contemplated an immediate investigation and report, the one first voted on requiring that the oath should be first administered by virtue of the prima facie right growing out of the certificate of election; the other that Mr. Roberts should not be sworn in pending the investigation. The propriety, the importance, the necessity of prompt investigation were avowed and recognized in both resolutions. The House decided in favor of the latter.

Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the unfriendly criticism that this action of the House has provoked, nor insensible to the animadversion it has pleased some writers to visit upon the heads of those who supported the majority resolution. Have we by this action established a dangerous precedent and one that will return as a plague in the future? Is it to be supposed that what we have so done will ever hereafter be invoked and relied upon in justification of some extreme and unpatriotic, partisan and selfish proposition, or that any member of Congress upon his responsibility as such, will ever be so stupid and dishonest as to attempt to shelter himself behind the Roberts case in support of any vicious or mere exigent party purpose? Will those who are to come after us be less devoted to duty and patriotic obligation than we are?

I believe such apprehensions are groundless, and that the case under consideration is unique, abnormal, solitary in its originality, and the like of it will never again be known. Let us see. The movement adverse to Roberts does not take its origin from political, partisan hostility—his political affiliations are in no way involved—the opposition to him is not personal, nor confined to any political party, for no political party could endure for a day in this Christian Republic if it were unfriendly to monogamy.

It is not attributable to religious intolerance or sectarian prejudice or fanaticism, for in connection with this movement, denominational unity is everywhere exhibited; it is not because he is a Mormon, for many of us have the most pleasant recollections of our associations with his predecessors, Caine and RAWLINS and King, who, while Mormons, were each the husband of only one wife, and were worthy and admirable men, and were admitted to the House as Delegates and Member without the slightest protest, either upon the part of the House or the country, and proved themselves useful and efficient in their public service.

It is on account of no sectionalism, for the remonstrance has hailed from every part of the Union and even from some of the people of Utah; it is the result of no division of sentiment in the great body of American citizenship concerning the national policy of antagonism to polygamy, for all men and all parties have for years mutually joined and cooperated for its suppression; nor is it because of any divergent opinions as to the claims and processes and objects of civilization, the general welfare, the domestic tranquillity, the blessings of liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the free exercise of religion, or the right of representation. This case and this precedent will expire with each other, and, relying upon the considerate judgment of thoughtful men and resting upon the consciousness of representative duty faithfully performed and an honest interpretation of the power with which we have been clothed, we are confident of our rectitude and content with our action.

Mr. Speaker, your committee have patiently, faithfully, and carefully made the investigation which the House required, with all reasonable economy and dispatch consistent with the gravity and importance of the work assigned them. With an earnest purpose to truly inquire into and duly ascertain the facts bearing upon the case, we have brought witnesses from Utah, from the very home of Mr. Roberts, and in his presence and with open doors we have taken their sworn testimony. He has been allowed and availed himself of ample opportunity for cross-examination. We have examined record and other documentary evidence.

We have inquired into the whole matter as fully as we could and sought light and truth from every available and legitimate source of information. We have tested the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses and acquainted ourselves with actual conditions as they exist. We have had printed and made public the evidence we have obtained, and it is accessible to anyone who may desire to inspect it. We have taken upon ourselves the burden of proof, Mr. Roberts admitting only the fact of his having pleaded guilty to the charge of unlawful cohabitation with Celia Dibble, sometimes called Celia Roberts, in 1889, and otherwise making full denial.

We have solemnly found and do say that Brigham H. Roberts, the Representative-elect from the State of Utah, is now and for years has been a polygamist; that he does now sustain, and for a long period of time has sustained, polygamous relations with plural wives; that he is now and has for years been the head of three families; that the children of different living mothers owe their paternity to him and recognize him, as does the community where they live, as their father; and that the epitaph of a deceased child, buried in the very town where he resides, recites, "Lena, daughter of B. H. and Celia Dibble Roberts," and that twins were born to him in 1897 by Celia Dibble Roberts, and that he now lives in the habit and repute of marriage with Louisa Smith Roberts, Celia Dibble Roberts, and Dr. Margaret Shipp Roberts. And so say we all.

These relations existed and were well known at the time and long before Mr. Roberts was elected to this Congress. We admit that he has "attained the age of 25 years, that he has been for seven years a naturalized citizen of the United States, and was when elected an inhabitant of the State in which he was chosen."

These are the facts upon which this House is now called to pass, and upon them it must be determined whether Mr. Roberts should be a member of this Congress. If upon these facts the House would or could expel him, should not the House now exclude him? And is not the prima facie right to be sworn in foreclosed and concluded by the facts ascertained? Do they constitute a sufficient cause to warrant the House of Representatives in refusing to him admission and membership?

I will pass over the long chapter of the Territorial history of Utah with reference to polygamy—the statutes and prohibitions and penalties enacted by Congress for its punishment and suppression; repeated petitions and appeals of Utah for admission as a State, first refused and finally granted; proclamations of amnesty by two Presidents of the United States conditioned upon the faithful observance of the laws; manifestoes and representations of the official authorities of the Mormon Church in recognition of and acquiescence in the laws of the United States; the enabling act, the conditions precedent, the pledges made and the spirit and intention of the contemporaneous compact between Utah and the United States; the constitutional inhibition of polygamy by the State of Utah; the adoption of anti-polygamy statutes accompanying the transition to statehood; laws enacted by the legislature of Utah against adultery and unlawful cohabitation—I will pretermit all these things and their discussion in extenso, because they have already been fully quoted and analyzed and, besides, are commonly known, and content myself here with the statement that the people of the United States, both through Congressional enactment and universal sentiment, denunciation, and conduct, have for many years, in every way they could, made their will and judgment manifest, uniformly, consistently, and persistently displayed their implacable hostility to and unwavering condemnation of polygamy and its practices; and neither they nor Congress as their agency would ever have consented to conferring statehood on Utah except with the understanding that such crimes should cease.

The laws and the conscience of the American people have considered and do consider polygamy and polygamous relations as criminal, and they can not and will not tolerate nor condone them, much less indorse them as having any proper place in the decent civilization of the country. In their concept, they stand out as a monumental defiance and contempt of what they consider the essential foundations of social purity and domestic felicity. Moreover, they do and will regard their advocacy, recognition, and practice as rank disloyalty to the very integrity of the Republic [loud applause]; and are they not warranted in this attitude?

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution requires that Representatives shall be citizens of the United States for seven years, Senators for nine years, and that the President shall be a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. It neither prescribes citizenship nor age nor inhabitancy in the case of judges, ambassadors, public ministers, consuls, or other officers. It requires these things of you and me as Representatives of Congressional districts, but no qualifications are prescribed for a judge of the Supreme Court, whose far-reaching power and influence may, on a close division, by his opinion or a change of his views, overturn the judicial precedents of a century.

To understand what was intended and had in view, present and prospective, we must look to what was said in the Convention, the times, and the surroundings. We had but recently emerged from a war with Great Britain and colonial dependency. The framers of the Constitution were naturally jealous and suspicious of their late enemy and were doubtless apprehensive that the British Crown might in some way seek to encompass confusion, embarrassment, and detriment of some kind to the new Republic. They wished to preclude any foreign intrusion or interference in the establishment of their Government and to anticipate and provide against any extraneous influence upon its legislative action after the Constitution should be ratified. They desired to accentuate in every way their independence and to set up a new government in their own manner and by their own people, and assert their right to "do all acts and things that independent States may of right do." They intended to have for their agents men of their own kind and persuasion, either native to the soil or so associated by effort and experience in their struggle for liberty, as to assure their unstinted sympathy, loyalty, and devotion to the new order of things. There was reason for their action and method in what they did.

I find in Bancroft's History that when the question of qualifications for Representatives was under consideration especial importance was attached to citizenship. It was regarded as indispensable. The possible election of a newcomer from a foreign country was viewed with distrust and to be expressly prevented. There was at first a difference of opinion as to the length of citizenship requisite for eligibility of Representatives, some favoring a less period than seven years. There were even in the Convention some members who were not native Americans, notably Wilson, Robert Morris, and Fitzsimmons. As illustrating the mind and purpose of the Convention, I quote from the debates and proceedings:

> I do not choose—
> Said Mason—
> to let foreigners and adventurers make laws for us and govern us without that local knowledge which ought to be possessed by the Representatives.

And it is said he moved for seven years instead of three, and that all the States agreed to this except Connecticut. Bancroft says that from respect for Wilson, who was born and educated in Scotland, the subject was taken up once more. Gerry, on the 13th of August, 1787, "wished that none should be elected but men born in the land." Williamson preferred a residence of nine years to seven; Hamilton to require only citizenship and inhabitancy, and Madison seconded him.

The organization of the legislative and executive departments of the Government was naturally to precede the designation and appointment of judges and other public officers, and for that reason, doubtless, as to them no qualifications were prescribed, notwithstanding the judicial branch was to be equal in rank and dignity with the others. I suppose it was presumed that these matters could be safely intrusted to the discretion and patriotism of the appointing and confirming powers. Upon these two departments, the executive and the legislative, was to rest the primary responsibility of launching the craft of the "more perfect union," and that accomplished, the future sailing would be confided to competent pilots whose vigilance would avoid any breakers in its course.

It is to be noted that provision for a future uniform rule of naturalization was made, and if I mistake not, this was discussed in the Convention with reference to and in connection with the ineligibility of foreigners.

There was obviously a good and special reason for prohibiting "any person holding any office under the United States from being a member of either House." The separation and free exercise of the functions of the independent departments of the Government were to be fully conserved.

Nearly three-quarters of a century after our fathers sat in the Constitutional Convention and formulated the great principles of republican institutions, there occurred a terrible civil war between the States. When it was over and the Union was preserved, there was incorporated into the Constitution an amendment denying to any person who had previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, etc., to support the Constitution of the United States, and who should have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, the right to be a Senator or Representative; providing, however, for removal of such disability. The recollection of this fearful conflict is so fresh in the memory of all of us and the reasons for and the circumstances attending the adoption of this amendment are so well understood, as to call for no special interpretation of its spirit and intent.

There is and was a reason for each rule of disqualification, and each was designed and constructed for a specific purpose pertinent to particular conditions and surroundings, and each and all are declared negatively in form and preceded by the words:

> No person shall.

It is, I think, of special significance that the first draft of the section which prescribes the qualifications of Representatives, when reported to the Convention, read as follows:

> Every member of the House of Representatives shall be of the age of 25 years at least; shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least three years before his election, and shall be at the time of his election a resident of the State in which he shall be chosen.

And is affirmative in form.

As it was finally adopted and now appears in the Constitution it reads as follows:

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of 25 years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

And is negative in form. There must have been some reason for this change. Evidently there is a substantial difference not only in phraseology, but in the respective constructions to be given.

The first is, I think, exclusive in effect, while the last is not. The chronological order in which they were discussed and considered in the Convention is not material. It is enough to know that when the subject was under consideration Mr. Dickinson said he—> was against any recitals of qualifications in the Constitution. It was impossible to make a complete one; and a partial one would, by implication, tie up the hands of the legislature from supplying omissions.

Wilson concurred in the opinion of Dickinson, and said:

> Besides, a partial enumeration of cases will disable the legislature from disqualifying odious and dangerous characters.

In view of the objections urged by Dickinson and Wilson, as we say in the report of the committee, and their opinions as to the construction that would arise and the consequences thereof, the conclusion seems certainly reasonable, if not absolutely irresistible, that the change from the affirmative to the negative form was intentionally made, and with the very purpose of obviating such objections, and hence that in being negatively stated, it was considered by the Convention that the particular qualifications mentioned would not be exclusive, and would not render impossible the "disqualifying, odious, and dangerous characters," and would not prevent "supplying omissions."

In consideration of all these things, is it reasonable to conclude that nonage and alienage and noninhabitancy, and nothing more, should ever stand in the way of membership in the House of Representatives? And does the expression of these particular disqualifications, negatively stated, necessarily exclude every other possible cause of ineligibility? And if a person be not obnoxious to either of them, is he therefore conclusively fitted and suited for the responsible duties of and participation in the all-important and dignified work of making laws for the whole country? Are age and citizenship and inhabitancy all that are needed to make good Congressional material, and if equipped with these only, is a person elected, propter hoc, duly and truly prepared, worthy and well qualified for all the weighty and solemn engagements of Representative service? Was it intended that a capable and upright man, who might lack one day of being 25 years old, or one day of citizenship for seven years, should be disqualified, and that a malefactor or "odious and dangerous character" of any kind, should be constitutionally eligible to a seat in the House of Representatives?

Mr. Speaker, my judgment, my conscience, my common sense, my respect for the authors of the Constitution and regard for their practical wisdom, my concept of the reason of rules and their unstrained construction, the fair interpretation of language, the ethics of government, the proprieties and integrities of legislative assemblies, and the respect to which they are entitled and the esteem in which they should be held, the claims of organized society, the responsibility of the House to the great body politic and what it owes to itself in the just estimate of its high privileges and the rightful assertion of its intrinsic potentiality, constrain me to answer "no."

We, as members here, not only represent our own immediate constituencies and respective localities, but we stand for the whole Union. We are a composite body and must work for what concerns the well-being of the entire country, and it behooves us to unite our efforts in the condemnation of any general organized evil or infidelity to the laws and crystallized policy of the whole American people. We owe something to each other, something to social order, something to public morals and associated Christianity, something to society at large, something to the land in which we live, the Government of which we are a part, and the perpetuation of our distinctive civilization.

Mr. Speaker, some reference has been made to the religious features of this case. While I maintain in all earnestness and in its proper vigor the ancient and fundamental doctrine of divorce between church and state, while I shall never cease to do honor to Roger Williams and his colaborers for the initiation in our polity and their faithful successors later on, for their instrumentality in the incorporation in our Constitution of the great principle of religious freedom and the declaration that no statutory mandate shall invade "the home of reason," assault "the citadel of conscience," or disturb "the sanctuary of the soul," while I concede and fully approve the well-defined separation of ecclesiastic and political functions, and shall ever oppose the trenching of the one upon the other, still the conviction grows upon my mind that the Christian people of this country are the hope of the Republic and the shield and buckler of our civilization. [Applause.]

Neither they nor we can afford to allow any man or set of men, under the claim of religious faith, to practice what the enlightened world denounces as a crime, and escape our disapprobation.

Civilization—

Said Lord Russell, the lord chief justice of England, in a speech a few years ago before the American Bar Association—is not a veneer; it must penetrate to the very heart and core of the societies of men. Its true signs are, thoughts for the poor and suffering, chivalrous regard and respect for woman, * * * the love of ordered freedom, abhorrence of what is mean and cruel and vile.

Civilization with us owes most of all that it is and will be, in its highest development, to Christianity. It is our duty in every suitable way to promote that civilization, and to stand resolutely against all that obstructs its proper progress and successful operation. Who is there among us that will not rejoice to see the full realization of Emerson's prophecy, that "Every useful, every elegant art, every exercise of the imagination, the height of reason, the noblest affection, the purest religion will find their home in our institutions and write our laws for the benefit of men?"

Mr. Speaker, the framers of our Constitution realized their dependence upon an all-wise Providence, and were not indifferent to religious obligations. I find that at one time during their deliberations, when, as Martin reported, "the Convention was on the verge of dissolution, scarce held together by the strength of a hair," Benjamin Franklin, the oldest one among them, to restore calm, just as the House was about to adjourn, proposed that the Convention should be opened every morning by prayer, and said:

The longer I live the more convincing proofs I see that God governs in the affairs of men. I firmly believe that "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

George Washington, who was President of the Constitutional Convention, in his Farewell Address, which will be a classic while the English language is spoken and political scripture wherever Americans dwell, said:

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are the indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness—these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connection with private and public felicity. * * *

Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the Constitution declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," and that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States," I can not believe for one moment that it was ever even remotely contemplated that polygamy and polygamous customs should masquerade in the guise and under the auspices of the Christian religion; and were it possible for Franklin and Washington and any of their illustrious coadjutors to stand incarnate among us to-day, they would, like us, regard them as inimical to the peace and dignity of our institutions and be amazed at any such perversion of the Constitution as a contrary contention would involve. They would, I think, be among the very first to indorse and uphold the united moral sentiment and Christian convictions of the great body of the people, and remain among the very last in insisting that the House of Representatives should do them no violence.

We are not here, Mr. Speaker, to refuse any proper representation to the people of any Congressional district in the United States; we are not here to usurp the province of electors at the polls; we are not here to institute inquiry into the private lives and sit in censorship upon the characters of our fellows; we are not here to impose general, moral, or religious tests. It is nothing to us, in our representative capacity, whether a man be a gnostic or an agnostic, an infidel or a believer, a Catholic or a Protestant, a Mormon or an anti-Mormon; but we are here to discountenance polygamy and its relations as a public enormity, and to refuse to anyone practicing the same that national recognition which admission to membership in this great House of the People would signify. [Applause.]

We are here to say to the people of Utah that we are ready and cheerful to accord to them all the privileges and immunities belonging to the citizens of sovereign States. We say to them, "You may send to Congress whomsoever you will, Mormon or Gentile, and freely exercise your own judgment as to his merits, whatever may be his political or religious persuasion; we guarantee to you a republican form of government; but we will never honor your credentials nor welcome your Representative-elect if he be in fact a polygamist and have, in the habit and repute of marriage, more than one living wife. You must keep your covenant with the American people and respect the laws and civilization of the age."

Mr. Speaker, I have read much of the interesting and in many respects pathetic history of the Mormon people; of their original faith, when no alleged revelation had sanctioned plural wives; of their incipient organization as a church; of their industry and frugality; of the severity with which some of them were treated; of their banishment and exodus, and their weary and perilous pilgrimage to the distant plains; of their suffering and sorrow; of their industrial progress and the marvelous development of their new land, and of how they "have made the wilderness and the solitary place glad and the desert to blossom as the rose," and often at the perusal my commiseration has been aroused. While I can tolerate if not approve their primary faith, and concede to them the full right "to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences," I can never look with allowance upon any avowal and practice of polygamy.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the altars and the firesides of our common land, the rooftrees of American homes, the holy estate of matrimony, and the sacred and inviolable associations of the family circle, with a solemn regard for the Constitution of my country and the dignity of the great popular branch of its Legislature, and "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind," and the fear of God before my eyes, I declare my belief that Brigham H. Roberts ought not for one instant of time to be admitted to membership in this House of Representatives. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAHON. If the minority report is adopted, establishing his right to be sworn in, will he be entitled to pay and privileges of the House as a member-elect?

What procedure under the rules of the House will be required to bring him to the bar of the House to be sworn in if he should fail to voluntarily appear, as he can not be expelled until after he is sworn in?

If he is sworn in and becomes a member of the House, will his expulsion deprive him, as an ex-member, under rules of the House, of admission "to the Hall of the House and rooms leading thereto?"

The SPEAKER. Those several questions will be disposed of as they arise. [Laughter.] They do not arise at this time.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, the substitute, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, or to be offered by him, which may be considered, for the purpose of this unanimous consent, as offered, be considered as pending, subject to a point of order, and that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the resolution, the substitute, and the amendment so offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Pending that request, Mr. Speaker, I first desire to know if any previous question has been ordered on the resolution reported by the committee and the substitute?

The SPEAKER. No previous question has been ordered thus far.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Well, then, it would not be necessary to obtain unanimous consent that the amendment should be pending and the previous question ordered.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, objection seems to be made to the request for unanimous consent, and I move the previous question on the resolution and substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves the previous question on the resolution reported by the majority and the substitute therefor reported by the minority.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did you not include the amendment?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did the gentleman from Ohio not include in his demand for the previous question that the amendment should be included? I so understood the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LACEY. He did not.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House, the Chair will state, but the resolution reported by the majority and the substitute reported by the minority; and the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question on those two resolutions.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that motion, and will yield to the gentleman from Iowa solely for the purpose of offering the amendment, upon which I will reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio yields for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Iowa to offer the amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Reserving the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. What is it to be offered as an amendment to?

Mr. LACEY. It will be stated in a moment.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. It will be offered as an amendment to the resolution of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 4, page 1, after the word "and," the following: "he is expelled, and;" so as to read:

"Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances in this case Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and he is hereby expelled, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant."

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Upon that amendment I make the point of order that it is not germane to the resolution which it seeks to amend.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers the amendment just read to the resolution reported by the majority, and the gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that it is not germane to the resolution. The Chair desires to know if the gentleman from Ohio withdrew the demand for the previous question?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I did.

The SPEAKER. Very well. Then the point of order is debatable. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I understand the discussion of the point of order is entirely within the control of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. As to the length of it, yes. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I have an idea about the parliamentary situation here, but my idea is disputed in my hearing, and I wish to make this parliamentary inquiry: Whether it is in order now for me to move the previous question on the resolution, the substitute, and the amendment without waiving the point of order? I do not think it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order must first be disposed of.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. As there seems to be no disposition to debate it, I hope the Chair will decide it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to debate the point of order?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Yes, sir; I did not clearly understand the question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks if the gentleman desires to be heard upon his point of order?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I desire to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I make the point of order upon this amendment, Mr. Speaker, that it is not germane to the resolution. The resolution provides for the exercise of a well-defined power of the House of Representatives, to exclude a member elected from its councils. That is one great power allowed to the House; the amendment seeks to invoke another great power of the House, entirely independent, namely, the power to expel.

Now, then, the power to expel can in no way be connected with the power to exclude. They are entirely different and separate operations and efforts upon the part of the House of Representatives. Similar questions have been decided in this House, and I do not know that there is any doubt about the proposition that a resolution to expel is not germane to a resolution to exclude.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio is rather late in his discovery that no question of expulsion is contained in this proposition. He should have made a point of order against the substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine, which directly involves the proposition of expulsion. Having failed to make the point of order on the minority resolution, it is properly before the House, and a point of order against an amendment upon the subject of expulsion comes too late. If the substitute did not in terms bring before the House the question of expulsion, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio and the majority of the committee does bring it up, and I quote from page 6 of the majority report as follows:

Nor are those who assert that expulsion is the remedy necessarily barred from voting for the resolution declaring the seat vacant. He must, indeed, be technical and narrow in his construction of the Constitution who will not admit that if a vote to declare the seat vacant is sustained by a two-thirds majority the Constitution is substantially complied with.

That is the official statement made by the gentleman himself, that this resolution if passed by a two-thirds vote would be substantially a resolution of expulsion, and therefore that question is before the House. The question is brought before the House. For three days, without objection, without any point of order having been made, without a single member having been called to order for discussing this proposition, we have gone thoroughly over the entire ground of expulsion.

I say the point is made entirely too late if it ever was proper. But the point of order will not lie against a proposition of this kind. The question involved is as to the right of a member to a seat. It rises above the rules of this House; it rises to the very source from which this House obtains its authority to sit. The right of expulsion and the right of exclusion are constitutional questions, and this House is not acting upon mere parliamentary rules, but we are passing on the great constitutional question as to the right of this member to occupy, to retain, to have, to hold in the future a seat in this body. That may be reached in various ways. It involves the very proposition that was embraced in the report of the committee.

This matter need not, in fact, have gone to a committee at all. This is a matter that the House could have acted on and have taken the whole testimony before the House itself. It is not a question about committee authority. We are trying before the House a constitutional question that this body could have decided directly without the intervention of a committee, and we are not limited by any technical rules.

The House could have heard this testimony. The House submitted the taking of testimony to nine gentlemen. They have reported the facts—they have reported them unanimously. The House need not look at the testimony; the House accepts the unanimous findings. With that finding of facts we are content; and the question arises now, What shall we do with the facts reported before the House? Let me read the facts. They are brief.

We find that Brigham H. Roberts was elected as a Representative to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah and was at the date of his election above the age of 25 years; that he had been for more than seven years a naturalized citizen of the United States and was an inhabitant of the State of Utah.

We further find that about 1878 he married Louisa Smith, his first and lawful wife, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since their marriage has borne him six children.

That about 1885 he married as his plural wife Celia Dibble, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since such marriage has borne him six children, of whom the last were twins, born August 11, 1897.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is this directed to the point of order?

The SPEAKER. That is the question to which the gentleman is addressing himself.

Mr. LACEY. I am reading only the specific facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not yet determine the application the gentleman will make of those facts.

Mr. LACEY. I am nearly through the finding.

That some years after his said marriage to Celia Dibble he contracted another plural marriage with Margaret C. Shipp, with whom he has ever since lived in the habit and repute of marriage. Your committee is unable to fix the exact date of this marriage. It does not appear that he held her out as his wife before January, 1897, or that she before that date held him out as her husband, or that before that date they were reputed to be husband and wife.

That these facts were generally known in Utah, publicly charged against him during his campaign for election, and were not denied by him.

That the testimony bearing on these facts was taken in the presence of Mr. Roberts, and that he fully cross-examined the witnesses, but declined to place himself upon the witness stand.

Those are the only facts.

Several MEMBERS. Rule! Rule!

Mr. LACEY. I know it is a late hour, gentlemen, but this is an important matter. This resolution does not simply say that Mr. Roberts is not entitled to have a seat. It goes further, and says he ought not to hold a seat. That involves the question of expulsion, and gentlemen who hold the views that I hold are invited to vote for the proposition because it is one in which expulsion is involved.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker has any doubt about this question I would be glad to be heard for a few moments. If he has not, I do not want to trespass on the patience of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt about the question.

Mr. DALZELL. Then I do not desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to one or two facts preliminary to the decision of this question. We have two propositions pending before the House—one of exclusion, which is the proposition of the majority, and one in which we are served with notice that expulsion will be asked for, but involving first the swearing in of Mr. Roberts.

The resolution of the minority does not contain any element of expulsion, but notice is served by the minority that so soon as the oath is administered to Mr. Roberts his expulsion will be moved. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] adds to the proposition recommended by the majority the idea of expulsion.

The proposition as it stands will deny Mr. Roberts a seat, will not allow him to sit for one instant in this House. That is the proposition of the majority. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] does not deny him a seat alone, but says, with the majority, that he must not have or hold a seat, but that he must also be excluded from his seat.

The proposition of the majority, which denies Mr. Roberts a seat, can be carried through this House, under the rules, by a majority vote. With the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] added, that of expulsion, it will require a two-thirds vote to carry the amended resolution. Does anyone contend that changing a resolution from a condition where a mere majority can carry it through to a resolution which will require a two-thirds vote to carry it through—that such an amendment is germane to the original proposition?

The Chair does not entertain a single doubt but that this is not germane to the original resolution. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] says, however, that this involves a question above and beyond the rules, being a question of the highest privilege.

The Chair holds with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that it is a constitutional question and one of the highest privilege, but this body has pursued constitutional methods in treating it, and is now, through a committee appointed in recognition of this high right, considering the matter, and that committee, in the discharge of its great duty to this House under the Constitution, has brought in its two propositions.

The Chair therefore holds that the amendment is out of order, and recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER].

Mr. LACEY. With all due respect to the Chair, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOPKINS. And I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, let us move with calmness and care. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] rises to exercise a sacred right, that of appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I move to lay the appeal on the table, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] moves to lay the appeal on the table. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, to lay the appeal of the gentleman from Iowa on the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LACEY. A division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands a division. On this point, however, the Chair desires to say that he has the right to order tellers and will not count on a matter involving his decision. The Chair, therefore, will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The tellers having taken their places, the House proceeded to divide.

Pending the announcement of the result,

Mr. LACEY said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the evident spirit of the House on the question, I withdraw the appeal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his appeal.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves the previous question on the original resolution and the substitute.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute reported by the minority.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, let us adjourn. There will be two yea-and-nay votes.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the adoption of the substitute reported by the minority will vote "aye"——

Mr. SLAYDEN. The yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANHAM. We should like to have the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls for the reading of the minority substitute. Without objection, it will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Brigham H. Roberts, having been duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, with the qualifications requisite for admission to the House as such, is entitled, as a constitutional right, to take the oath of office prescribed for members-elect; his status as a polygamist, unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives, affording constitutional ground for expulsion, but not for exclusion from the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute which has been read.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 81, nays 244, not voting 29; as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, before the pairs are announced, I wish to state to the House that owing to the importance of this question and its nonpolitical character I have not assumed the responsibility or attempted to pair absent members on this question or on the one which will follow this, nor have I been able to secure pairs for absent members on this particular question who have requested me to do so. I have names here of those members who have requested me to obtain pairs for whom I could obtain no pairs, and who desired to be paired in favor of the majority report. I will announce the names now: Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire, Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, Mr. CUSHMAN, Mr. RODENBERG, Mr. BROMWELL, Mr. KERR, and Mr. WEYMOUTH.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish also to make the statement that not knowing how gentlemen on this side of the House desired to be paired upon the vote upon this question, I have not secured a pair for any gentleman except for those who will be announced from the Speaker's desk, who have expressed how they desired to vote upon the question. All other absentees who did not express how they desired to vote on this question I have not attempted to pair. I wish to state that the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. FOX, desired to be paired in favor of the majority report, but I was unable to obtain a pair for him; and if he were here he would have voted for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HARMER, has requested me to state that he is kept at home by reason of sickness. If he were here, he would have voted to sustain the majority report of this committee.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if my colleague, Mr. BELLAMY, from North Carolina, has voted?

The SPEAKER. There is a pair for the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BELLAMY.

Mr. LINNEY. I voted, then, under misapprehension. I voted "nay." I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. RODENBERG, who is unavoidably detained from the House and the city, wired me to say that he would like me to secure a pair for him and, if a pair were not obtained, to announce that he would have voted for the majority as against the minority report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BROMWELL, necessarily called away yesterday, desired me to state that if he were present, he would have voted to sustain the majority report and expected that he would be paired.

The SPEAKER. That information has been given to the House by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The following pairs were announced:

After Monday, 22d:

Mr. LINNEY with Mr. BELLAMY.

Until Monday:

Mr. REEVES with Mr. SPARKMAN.

For this day:

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. DAVEY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution reported by the majority.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 268, nays 50, not voting 36; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is due my colleague, Mr. FLEMING, to state that he is absent on account of serious illness.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. ALEXANDER, is quarantined at his residence. Were he here, he would have voted against the minority report and for the majority report.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. ALEXANDER with Mr. MCCALL, on this question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Loud applause.]

On motion of Mr. TAYLER of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature of the enrolled bill (S. 1933) to provide an American register for steam whaler Bowhead.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Clara N. Flower et al. against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of William J. Webb, administrator of estate of John Webb, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7081) to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence, reported the same without amendment, accom-

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Olmedo Alfaro, of Ecuador; and

H. R. 4602. An act to authorize the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Reno and Fort Sill military reservations, in the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6777. An act relative to the widening and extension of Sixteenth street in the District of Columbia.

CENSUS.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report which I desire to present—a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2179) entitled "An act relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "censuses," at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"Provided, That in taking the census of said classes the inquiries shall be confined to the following four questions, namely: Name, age, sex, and post-office address."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

A. J. HOPKINS,
CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
F. M. GRIFFITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOS. H. CARTER,
EUGENE HALE,
S. D. McENERY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees was read:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon in the accompanying conference report, namely:

On amendment numbered 1, concerning statistics of deaf, dumb, and blind, it is proposed to add that in taking the census of said classes the inquiries shall be confined to the questions of name, age, sex, and post-office address.

The amendment of the House numbered 2, relating to statistics in regard to mines, mining, and minerals, is stricken out.

A. J. HOPKINS,
CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
F. M. GRIFFITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of this report; and if no gentleman desires to ask any question, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the adoption thereof the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

The bill, with the accompanying report, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

SAC AND FOX INDIANS IN IOWA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask its present consideration.

The Clerk read the following resolution, submitted January 18, 1900, by Mr. COUSINS:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain and report to the House, as early as practicable, what was the number of Indians of that part of the confederated tribes known as the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi, residing in the State of Iowa, to and for whom no portion of the tribal annuities was paid or expended for the period from 1855 to 1869, both inclusive, as reported by him to Congress March 12, 1896 (Senate Document No. 167, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), and what would have been the amount of their shares if said tribal annuities, less the amounts annually expended to meet requirements of treaty provisions, had been apportioned and distributed pro rata to the members of the different portions of said tribes; also, what were the numbers, annually, of the members of said tribes, as shown by the accounts of the proper disbursing officers, from 1867 to 1899, both inclusive, receiving annuities at the agencies having charge of the respective portions of said tribes and the amounts of the tribal annuities paid to or expended for each portion, less the amounts annually expended to meet the requirements of treaty provisions, and to state and report an account showing in detail any unequal apportionment and distribution of said tribal annuities to that portion of the tribes now residing in the State of Iowa; and, further, to report what amount, if any, of the salary of the principal chief of the Fox Indians of said confederated tribes for the period from 1855 to 1899, both inclusive, has not been paid to him from said tribal annuities, as required by the fourth article of the treaty of 1842 and the ninth article of the treaty of 1867 with said Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I understand the deficiency bill has been returned from the Senate and is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly,

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON as conferees on the part of the House.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. BURTON. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with the subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the resolution; which was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be granted permission to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution presented by the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

FORT HAYS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the privilege of the House to call up a report from the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill (H. R. 955) granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation in said State for the purpose of establishing western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and of the Kansas State Normal School thereon, and for a public park, and ask immediate consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman refers will be read; after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, and all the improvements thereon, situated in the State of Kansas, be, and the same is hereby, granted to said State upon the conditions that said State shall establish and maintain perpetually thereon, first, a western branch of the Kansas Agricultural College; second, a western branch of the Kansas State Normal School, and that in connection therewith the said reservation shall be used and maintained as a public park: Provided, That said State shall, within five years from and after the passage of this act, accept this grant, and shall by proper legislative action establish on said reservation western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and the Kansas State Normal School; and whenever the lands shall cease to be used by said State for the purposes herein mentioned the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if there is a report accompanying this bill. And if so, I should like to have it read, reserving the right to object.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit me to make a statement, he will probably not insist upon his demand. The report is quite a lengthy document; and the gentleman from Kansas who calls up the bill can state the purport of it very much more briefly and present the facts accompanying it. I may state also that this is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this bill is an exact copy of the bill presented to the Fifty-third Congress, and which was passed both by the House and Senate, but failed to become a law by reason of the fact that it did not receive the President's signature. It was also introduced in the last session of the Fifty-fifth Congress and passed the Senate, but failed to reach a vote in the House by reason of the refusal of the Speaker to permit it to be taken up.

It is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands of the House; and the Committee on the Public Lands of the Senate have also unanimously reported in favor of it.

A provision of the bill—and the only essential feature of it—is to give to the State of Kansas an abandoned military reservation, known as the Fort Hays Military Reservation, containing somewhere about 7,000 acres of land. This land is to be used by the State, as provided in the bill, exclusively for educational purposes, to establish a branch agricultural college and State normal school for the benefit of the people of that State, and the legislature has unanimously asked that it be done. It is a matter of considerable importance to our people, and we appreciate the necessity and the importance of the legislation which is now proposed.

I may add that there is a provision embodied in the bill that if the land is not perpetually used for such purpose as is contemplated in the bill it shall revert to the General Government.

As I said, there are about 7,000 acres of land contained in this abandoned military reservation. When the Indians were removed from that western country to the Indian Territory many years ago it was abandoned. There are about forty buildings upon the reservation, which during all these years have been going to waste. The land is absolutely useless for Government purposes, and it is expensive for the Government even to try to protect its property. The reservation was opened up for settlement, but, being out in that section of the State where the land is arid, it was not settled, and was afterwards withdrawn from sale by the Secretary of the Interior in order that the Congress of the United States might take the action that was then contemplated in relation thereto. That is the present condition of this military reservation, and we are simply asking that it may be donated to the State to be used for these specific educational purposes.

I might say that the agricultural college of the State of Kansas is the largest agricultural college in the United States. It is now overcrowded, and the lands that are being used by that institution are not nearly large enough for the work that they desire to do. If this reservation is given to the State for that purpose, immediately there will be a branch agricultural college located there, and also a branch of the State Normal School, which has more than 1,200 pupils in it, and is one of the great educational institutions of our country. The people of the western part of the State particularly are anxious that this should be done in order that they may enjoy the privileges of these additional educational facilities. I trust that there will be no objection; that this matter may be taken up now and passed upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman what these lands are supposed to be worth?

Mr. MILLER. I think the lands were appraised at $4 an acre. The land is not valuable for any purpose as it is at present, but when once irrigated will become productive and valuable. Then, if it is not used for educational purposes, it will revert back to the Government of the United States in a much more valuable condition than it now is.

Mr. TERRY. Is this body of 7,000 acres of land to remain intact, or can you, under the bill, sell it off from time to time?

Mr. MILLER. It is to remain intact, with the exception of a portion of it that has some growing timber upon it, which is to be used for parking purposes, simply to beautify the school grounds for the Agricultural College and the State Normal School.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if I understood his statement that this land had ever been open to homestead settlement?

Mr. MILLER. The land was opened for homestead settlement under the law of 1884, but afterwards withdrawn from settlement because of the contemplated action of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Settlers were never given an opportunity to enter the land, were they?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; it was open for settlement for a number of years, but no settlers desired to go in and take the land for farming.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When was that done?

Mr. MILLER. The report shows the date when it was opened up, and it also shows when it was withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When does the report say this reservation was turned over to the public domain? When did it cease to be a military reservation and become a part of the public domain of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. Its use as a military reservation was abandoned some sixteen years ago, and no action of any kind was taken, excepting the opening up of this land for a settlement, until the action of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman this question: I understand this property is located near Fort Dodge.

Mr. MILLER. No; it is not near Fort Dodge; it is north of Fort Dodge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How far?

Mr. MILLER. About a hundred miles north of Fort Dodge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is not the surrounding country settled?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; some portions of that country are settled near there, and then immediately north of that, some 10 or 12 miles, it is thickly settled, and then again, some miles south it is well settled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think I have some recollection of this bill in the last Congress, and from the information I have, I think this bill covers valuable lands. When the matter was before Congress on a former occasion, I think it was stated that those lands were worth from $20 to $25 an acre, that they are not arid lands, that they are not unused lands, that the balance of the country surrounding it is open to settlement, and that it ought to be thrown open, at least to homestead settlement. For that reason I am constrained to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Just a moment. I do not think the gentleman from Alabama will persist in his objection if he knows the facts concerning the value of that land.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, unless the gentleman from Alabama withdraws it.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his objection until I can make a statement?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no discretion, unless the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his objection.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman withdraw his objection, to allow me to make a statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I will withdraw it temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of members, and especially for the information of the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, is it understood that I only withdrew my objection to let the gentleman have the floor temporarily?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Alabama withdrew his objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I made the statement that I withdrew it temporarily.

The SPEAKER. There is no such thing as a temporary withdrawal, but there is nothing to prevent the gentleman renewing the objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to have the privilege of renewing it.

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like to state, for the information of members, that I have a personal knowledge of the country wherein this land is situated. It is in the extreme western portion of the State, or at least in the western one-third of the State, where the land is exceedingly dry and lies high above the streams. Immediately upon the streams, so far as their water supply will irrigate, we have population and agricultural use of the country. The higher lands, upon the prairie, that can not be irrigated, are practically worthless for agricultural purposes in their present condition. Occasionally we do get some wheat upon these high lands, but even that is precarious. These lands were open for settlement for a number of years, as the gentleman tells us, and no settler felt that he could afford to make the venture.

If the State of Kansas could be permitted to simply use these lands—we do not ask the title from the General Government, we simply ask permission to locate an experiment station of our agricultural college thereon—the State of Kansas could afford to sink artesian wells and lift to the surface a sufficient amount of water to sustain the experiment and determine the best way of utilizing these semidesert lands for the benefit of the entire State and the nation. We do not feel that the General Government would lose anything in ceding the mere use of these lands and what little improvements there may be upon them, which, as has been stated, are an expense to the Government to preserve them. It is impossible to sell these improvements for much.

Therefore I ask and hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection. This is the same legislation that once passed this House and simply failed on account of the limited time. It comes before us again with the unanimous report of the entire committee, and I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman to say that the land covered by this bill is a military reservation?

Mr. RIDGELY. Yes, sir. Its use, however, has been abandoned for some years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did the United States buy that land from anyone; and if so, from whom?

Mr. RIDGELY. The land has always been United States land. The Government allowed the Indians about 10 cents per acre for it by treaty.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Public domain?

Mr. RIDGELY. It is a part of the public domain, away out in what is called the short-grass country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. When was it transferred to the War Department for military purposes?

Mr. RIDGELY. It was simply made a military reservation, and now the Government has abandoned its use entirely.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And it was transferred to the public domain?

Mr. RIDGELY. For a time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it a part of the public domain at present?

Mr. RIDGELY. At present it is withdrawn from the public domain. That is, withheld from settlement.

Mr. MILLER. By order of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the legal status is that it is public land of the United States.

Mr. RIDGELY. Oh, yes.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. How many acres are there in this reservation?

Mr. RIDGELY. Seven thousand acres.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How long is it proposed to cede it to the State of Kansas?

Mr. RIDGELY. So long as the State shall use it as an experiment station and for school purposes, and it must begin this use within five years.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if this is not the sort of land that would be needed in case of another war for camp purposes for troops?

Mr. RIDGELY. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In case we have to establish camps in time of war, would not this be the kind of property that we ought to have in reserve for putting and training troops on?

Mr. RIDGELY. I think not. I think this Government will not have occasion to so use it within a century. We would not place an army so far from water and transportation; we have so much better and so much more highly improved military camps and military reservations already equipped to take care of our soldiers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But we did use them during the late war for camping purposes when we raised troops in the various States. Is not this available for camp purposes?

Mr. RIDGELY. The transportation facilities would not make it valuable or available for such purposes; nor is there sufficient water in the vicinity to admit of using this reservation as a camp for more than a small garrison force, and the necessity for this use has long since passed.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I would state to the gentleman from New Jersey that there is a military reservation of 22,000 acres at Fort Riley.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a slight misunderstanding upon the part of the House and upon the part of Congress in regard to this reservation. The reservation is a military reservation, which was transferred to the Interior Department to be disposed of under the McRae Act. It was to be appraised; and it has been appraised, opening the settlement under the McRae Act at the appraised value. After this had been done and before the time that it was to be settled, Congress took the matter up, and a bill was introduced, either in this House or in the Senate, to allow the State of Kansas to take possession of this property for educational purposes.

A large number of buildings there, practically worthless for any commercial purpose, can be utilized by the State for educational purposes. The property was appraised at about $5 an acre. It is worth in the neighborhood of $35,000, I am told. On account of the buildings there, which would be useful to the State for educational purposes, and in view of the comparatively small value of the land, if sold by the United States and the proceeds turned into the Treasury, it has been thought best to let the reservation go in this way for educational purposes. The Secretary of the Interior withdrew the land from market under the McRae Act, and a bill has been reported or passed in each Congress making this grant. Congress having the subject under investigation, the Secretary of the Interior declined to go on and dispose of the property until Congress has reached a determination upon the subject.

The property stands there in that way. In the meanwhile it is in charge of a custodian appointed by the Interior Department. It is rapidly deteriorating in value so far as the improvements are concerned. It is swept by the gentle Kansas cyclones and is subject to the other unfavorable influences of the weather, which affects buildings in that State perhaps more rapidly than in any other. The buildings are now in bad repair. Either Congress ought to vote down this proposition and let the property be disposed of under the McRae Act or else the grant to the State ought to be made as here proposed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What does the Government pay the Indians for the land?

Mr. LACEY. This is an old reservation which was occupied for years as a military reservation. The people of Kansas and the Indians of Kansas are now all very peaceful. It is no longer of any use as a military reservation and has been abandoned.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to make a statement for the benefit of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The statement was made on the floor of the House that this land was not worth exceeding seven or eight dollars an acre. It has generally been considered worth four or five dollars an acre. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has said, a custodian has been placed in charge of this military reservation, and year after year a bill is brought in here providing for its care. This property, if the proposed grant be made, will be used by the State for educational purposes. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not object.

Mr. REEDER. Let me say to the gentleman from Alabama that this is semiarid land. The experiments by the agricultural college will be very much more valuable than any use to which the land is now being put. The land, not arid, but semiarid, could be purchased for five to seven dollars an acre.

Let me add for the information of the House that the buildings, forty in number, were abandoned sixteen years ago, after having been in use for some years. They are now being destroyed by the cattle that range over the land. They are not being properly cared for, and if present circumstances continue will be in a few years absolutely worthless. With proper repairs they can be used for educational purposes. Two colleges can be established there by the State, and they will be highly advantageous by reason of the State of Kansas being 150 to 250 miles farther west than any of the existing colleges. Under the existing circumstances the Government, it seems to me, can not make any better disposition of this property.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not a fact that this is the best general purpose to which that property can be put?

Mr. REEDER. Very much so.

Mr. KLEBERG. Very much better than opening the lands to settlement?

Mr. REEDER. Decidedly.

Mr. KLEBERG. And if the property be disposed of in the way now proposed, it will redound to the benefit of the State and the country?

Mr. REEDER. Undoubtedly. There is no question about that.

Under present circumstances the property is of no value to the United States, and, as the gentleman has suggested, this is very much the best general purpose to which it can be devoted. I trust the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw any objection he may be disposed to urge, because this subject has been thoroughly considered by the committee. A measure of this kind has already twice passed the House and twice passed the Senate, and this bill has been unanimously reported by the Senate committee and by the committee of this House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have been opposed generally to the policy of the Government giving away military or Indian reservations when the property was of value. Sometimes the Government is the owner of certain classes of land which can not be used for settlement, and in such cases it may sometimes be proper to give them away for purposes of this kind.

But the question presented here is one entirely different. Here is a reservation which is recognized by the authorities as well as by gentlemen who have spoken upon this question—a reservation that the Government has purchased that can be sold for at least $35,000. It is a valuable piece of property. There is no reason, as far as I have seen up to the present time, for giving this amount to this particular school and not to some other. Besides that, it is not a part of the original domain. This same precedent, if carried into effect, would authorize us to give away the land that we buy from the Indians from year to year as we move them back.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. The Scripture says that we shall make our swords into plowshares and our barracks into schoolhouses. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But when you do that I for one want to be certain that they are properly located. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained, under the circumstances, to renew my objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of my friend from Alabama for a moment, I wish to state for his information a circumstance which may have possibly escaped his attention.

It is a fact that these abandoned military reservations have been given to the States for educational purposes for a long time. Many of them have been exceedingly valuable. A most valuable one in the State of Louisiana was given to the agricultural college of that State in 1886, and the possession of it by the State has been of immense benefit to our people. Upon that reservation when it was turned over to our State were buildings worth at least $75,000. There was a tract of desirable land containing about 210 acres. But this was given to the people of the State by the Government, and is being used to the advantage of all of our people.

In Boston, I remember, some years ago, the military reservation near that city, when it was abandoned, was given to the city simply for the purpose of using it for a park, and I am in favor of disposing of these reservations, abandoned as they have been, for educational purposes and the needs of the country. I ask the gentleman from Alabama, therefore, if, under the circumstances and in view of the fact that this is no new proposition, he will not withdraw his objection and at least allow a vote to be taken upon the bill as it comes from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the gentleman has objected, and the Chair has no discretion in the matter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this being Friday, the day on which the Private Calendar is entitled to consideration, and there being on the Calendar a bill (H. R. 1900) which the Department of State are very anxious to have considered, I think it would be a good thing for the House to consider it and get it out of the road. I want it considered in Committee of the Whole, because there may be some amendments offered. I therefore move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering House bill 1900, on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON. Why not all bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. MAHON. We have not time to-day.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman what House bill 1900 is?

Mr. MAHON. It is in regard to the cutting of the Manila cable. The amount involved is about $5,000.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is that the first bill on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that the motion should be to go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, let me make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. Is that the motion the gentleman makes?

Mr. MAHON. No; I should like to make a brief statement before I make any motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to make a brief statement. Without objection, he will be permitted to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I very much wish we could hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman requests permission to make a brief statement. He made a motion that the House go into the Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill on the Private Calendar. The Chair holds that his motion must be that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar. The gentleman now desires to make a brief statement, and that is the matter before the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart by unanimous consent for the purpose of eulogies on the late Mr. HOBART, the Vice-President, it is very evident that under that special order, which begins at 2 o'clock, it will be useless to take up the Private Calendar generally, because it will be merely a waste of time. This bill, which I ask unanimous consent to bring up, is in relation to the cutting of the Manila cable by Admiral Dewey, in Manila Harbor, after his famous fight. The bill in its present form involves about $5,000.

The report will show that there was a long correspondence between the British ambassador and this Government, and the first question related to damages, but that was settled between them by an agreement between the two Governments that no damages should be allowed for loss of business. But the British ambassador, Sir Julian Pauncefote, requested that this Government pay the actual expenses for the repairing of that cable. The Secretary of State has concurred in that, and the President has sent in a short message asking that this House make that appropriation, which will not exceed $5,000. Now, that is the statement of the case. They are very anxious to get this bill out of the way before any further complications grow out of it. It is immaterial to me whether the House passes this bill or not, but I think the House should consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania that when in Committee of the Whole House, the committee has the right to take up any particular bill. Does the gentleman renew his motion?

Mr. MAHON. No, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the committee can take up any bill, but I now ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Then we will not go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he promised to recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] to make a request for unanimous consent; and as two or three recognitions have taken place on the left, the Chair would be glad to recognize the gentleman from Arkansas first for a request, after which he will submit the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

CITY PARK IN HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6078) to amend section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., certain lands as a city park, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., a parcel of land known as the cemetery lot for a city park only, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That whenever the city of Hot Springs, Ark., shall relinquish to the United States of America all its right, title, and interest in and to the following-described lot or parcel of land, being a part of said cemetery lot, but which is now described in the plats and surveys of said city as lot 16, block 78, to wit: Commencing at the southwest corner of the said city park, in block 78 of the Hot Springs Reservation, and formerly known as cemetery lot, and running thence easterly along the north line of Benton street 150 feet; thence northerly 285 feet to a point on the north line of said park 150 feet easterly of the northwest corner thereof; thence to said northeast corner; thence along the west boundary line of said park 285 feet to the point of beginning, the same being a part of said lot 16, in block 78 aforesaid, which is hereby reserved by the United States as a site for the public building provided for by act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, the right and title of the United States to all the remaining part of said cemetery lot, now known as lot 16, in block 78, shall vest absolutely in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., for city park, city building, auditorium, or other public purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas how much there is in this cemetery granted to Hot Springs for the purposes of a park.

Mr. LITTLE. I would state to the gentleman from New York that the plat of ground referred to in this bill was originally an old cemetery lot, being a piece of ground 310 feet by 260 feet substantially, and by the act of 1880 this plat of ground was ceded to the city of Hot Springs for a public park only, on condition that the city of Hot Springs remove and reinter the dead at a place to be provided by the city. This has been done. The necessity for this bill arises in this way: A bill providing for a public building for Hot Springs, passed at the last Congress, provided that it should be located on the public reservation.

There was one lot in contemplation formerly, but it was found not feasible to locate it at that point. The city proposes now to relinquish back to the Government the amount of land that the Government desires for a public building if the Government would cede to the city the right to use this small piece which is not ceded for a city park for said building, which I think is a very desirable thing to do, both for the Government and the city. Within a block is the East Mountain Reservation, which is a park within itself. The agent of the Secretary of the Interior, who was sent down to examine this property, was very much impressed with the feasibility of that course of action, and the bill is really introduced and if passed it will be upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. I would be very glad to read his statement if the gentleman from New York desires to have it read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, when the bill to cede this cemetery to the city of Hot Springs was up before the House for consideration it was to be an absolute grant, and after some discussion consent was given to amend it so that it should be deeded for park purposes, and for park purposes only. I think it was predicted at that time that in two years there would be a demand on the part of Hot Springs to have this land absolutely, and it seems the demand has come now. But it has come with a piece or a little reservation and benefit to the United States, and instead of using a part of the large amount of the public lands at Hot Springs for the purpose of the public building, as it is to put a small portion of it back for use as a public building and the balance going to Hot Springs absolutely, I congratulate the House and the country that the United States Government gets a little something out of this by reason of what occurred years ago. I think I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AUSTRALASIA AND CHINA TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 6909.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6909) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company (Limited) for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company (Limited) for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain; and a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the claim.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to this bill and what is involved in it. I find the Secretary of State——

Mr. RIDGELY. I wish to reserve the right to object, if the gentleman from New York does not object, before discussion.

The SPEAKER. There is no reservation. If the gentleman wants to object, he must be here to object.

Mr. RAY of New York. I was making this statement as preliminary, possibly, to an objection. I suppose I am speaking by the grace of the House. Of course I only want to find what we are desired to consent to. The Secretary of State says:

It will be seen from the papers that no formal claim in behalf of the company is presented by Her Majesty's Government, but that that Government submits whether, as an act of grace, some pecuniary compensation may not be granted to the company for the loss which it alleges to have suffered in this regard.

Then this whole matter involved in this claim was referred to the Attorney-General of the United States; and after he had reviewed the whole matter, in a letter under date of February 1, 1899, he concludes with this statement:

I am of opinion, therefore, that, upon the law of the case, there is no ground for the claim of indemnity.

Now, when we look at this bill I find that the Secretary of State is directed to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited. And there is no amount named in this bill whatever.

Mr. MAHON. There is $5,000 in the amendment which the committee propose.

Mr. RAY of New York. And we are to pay it when there is no legal ground for it.

Mr. MAHON. That is only a part of the case. If the gentleman will read the whole report, he will understand it better. I am willing that the report be read to the House, and then ask unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. If we go into these matters, it seems to me, and pay all claims that are asked as a matter of grace by foreign governments and foreign companies in foreign countries to pay, we would pay out more money than we have in the Treasury, because we must have done a great deal of damage to the property of foreign individuals and to foreign companies; and it seems to me this bill, if passed, will make a very dangerous precedent. If it is a matter that we are going into, we should go into it with most careful consideration and thought; and unless the gentleman can present some better reasons than appear from these papers, I shall be constrained to object; but I am willing to hear the gentleman, and if I can reserve the right until he makes a statement, I will do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this is not the bill he said he wanted to consider if the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then why not go into Committee of the Whole? The gentleman can make the motion under the rule, and then we can all debate it.

Mr. MAHON. I will make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. STEELE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

EASTERN EXTENSION AUSTRALASIA AND CHINA TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

The first bill in order was the bill (H. R. 6909) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain.

Mr. MAHON. I move that the Committee of the Whole proceed to the consideration of this bill. I am perfectly willing that it should receive full and fair consideration. If we can not dispose of it finally to-day, let it go over as unfinished business. It is a matter in which not only this Government but other governments are interested. After the House has given this subject a full and fair hearing, let it make whatever disposition of it it may deem proper.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I protest against the passage of a bill which may establish so dangerous a precedent. It omits the clause which has always been customary in all cases of this kind. Let it be understood that the bill, if passed, is simply an act of grace; yet the provision usual in such cases is in this case omitted.

Mr. MAHON. I have no objection to an amendment such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HITT. The bill is in bad form and establishes a dangerous precedent.

Mr. MAHON. I ask the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether the Committee of the Whole will take up the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. As it relates to the order of business, it is not debatable.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain; and a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the claim.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to hear the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is open for debate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAHON. In the first place, there is an amendment I desire to offer—to insert, at the end of line 11, these words:

Provided, That said sum shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. After the general debate the amendment would be in order.

Mr. MAHON. I simply want to offer that amendment so that the House may understand what is intended.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment can be offered later.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should like to understand the status of this bill. As I understand, it is in Committee of the Whole and open for amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not now open for amendment.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I mean at a later time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the cable of this company belonged to citizens of other governments who were not at war with the United States. It was cut as a military necessity by Admiral Dewey, in order to cut off communication from Spain and also to cut off communication from China and other countries. The cable did not belong to a company of Spaniards. It belonged to people who were mostly Englishmen; some of them Chinamen. This demand was made upon our Government through their state department—through the regular channels—as to these payments for the work of repairing the cable which had been cut and also for damages running up into thousands of dollars because of the interruption of business on the line by reason of its cutting. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I need not go into any extended remarks to convince the House that the cutting of this cable, under present circumstances, created a liability which ought to be acknowledged and considered and met in some shape.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one or two questions?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, as I understand this matter, the cable referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the only cable from the island of Luzon to the continent of Asia. Is that correct?

Mr. MAHON. I think so.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, ever since the repair has been made in the cable it has been the only medium by which the Government of the United States could transmit its messages, and the only means by which we could, by telegraph, communicate with our forces on that island. Is that a fact?

Mr. MAHON. I think that is true.

Mr. RAY of New York. And we have been paying large sums of money for that work to these Englishmen and Chinamen who are the owners of this cable?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. And they have done more business in the last year, since the cable was cut and repaired, than they ever did before, and have received larger sums of money for doing business?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, well, the gentleman makes his questions too long.

Mr. RAY of New York. Just a moment. I say they have received more compensation and have done more business on account of the war, and the business of the United States given them in consequence and done over that telegraph line by it, than in twenty years they could possibly have received or done if the cable had not been cut. The war has worked to their benefit. Now, the question is, where is the equity in the bill which is presented by the gentleman, and why should we make this compensation at all?

Mr. MAHON. That is your side of the case; it is not mine.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MAHON. Now, after I have finished my statement I shall be glad to answer all questions.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to ask if this claim has been passed upon by the Government through any of its Departments?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; I will come to that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], the Government or this company, one or the other, had to repair this cable at once, or it could not have been used by the Government of the United States afterwards. This situation presented itself to this cable company: They were thoroughly equipped with all the machinery for taking up the cable and reuniting it, and Admiral Dewey and the United States forces in Manila Harbor had no appliances of that kind.

So this company promptly went to work and repaired this cable at the request of the Government, so that they could get it into use, as well as for the benefit of the cable company. It cost £912 5s. 6d., something over $4,400. Now, as to whether the United States used this cable or not, they used it as they use all other cables and all other telegraph lines, paying certain fixed rates and receiving in return a dollar's worth of service for every dollar paid; so that that does not come into this case at all. The Government was simply paying for valuable services rendered.

When this claim was made it was presented to the proper legal department of the British Government, and Sir R. T. Reid, Queen's counsel and member of Parliament, and Mr. Henry Sutton prepared an opinion in which they distinctly held that under international law, the United States not being at war with England, and the United States having taken the property of another nation and destroyed it for military purposes, under their view of the law governing international relations, the Government of the United States was not only responsible for the expense of repairing this cable, but responsible for the damages incurred by this company, running into the thousands of dollars, by reason of the nonuse of the cable. The account and this opinion were submitted to the State Department of the United States by the British ambassador. Mr. Hay, the Secretary of State, transmitted it to the Attorney-General, the law officer of the United States. He refutes the position taken by the British Government as to the liability of the United States Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me? Do I understand him to say that the Attorney-General of the United States holds that this Government is not liable for the damage done?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not legally liable?

Mr. MAHON. There is his opinion. I will not read either that or the opinion of the Queen's counsel. They simply say that under international law this Government is responsible, and this claim is pressed here by the British Government for her subjects, under the law regulating international affairs. The Attorney-General, after writing a long opinion, which I have briefed here, concludes as follows:

I am of the opinion, therefore, that upon the law of the case there is no ground for the claim of indemnity.

Now, here we have in dispute a claim of the subjects of another Government, presented by another Government, in which their highest law department insists that we are responsible under international law. This Government declares that that is not the law and that we are not responsible. After this case had reached that point the British minister addressed this letter to the Secretary of State:

[Unofficial.]

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, March 13, 1899.

DEAR MR. HAY: Referring to our conversation on Thursday last respecting the right to compensation for the cutting of submarine telegraphic cables in time of war, I write to express the hope that, in the absence of any positive rule of international law governing the subject, the claim to compensation by the owners of a cable in respect of injury to their property by a belligerent under circumstances involving no blame on their part will be recognized by your Government, from an equitable point of view at least, to the following extent:

In the opinion of my Government it would be reasonable that a rule should be established that under such circumstances compensation should be made to the extent of the actual cost of repairs.

I am desired by Lord Salisbury to submit that view to the favorable consideration of your Government, and in that connection to support unofficially the claim of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company on account of the cutting of their Hongkong-Manila and Manila-Capiz cables to the extent of repairs rendered necessary by that act.

I trust that your Government will be disposed to entertain this claim, apart from strictly legal consideration, and in fact to adopt the equitable rule suggested by my Government in such cases.

I remain, with great regard, yours, very truly,

JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

Mr. LLOYD. In that connection I wish to ask this question: On what ground does the English Government base its claim that this should be paid by the United States Government?

Mr. MAHON. Well, I would have to read the opinion quoted here.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not based on this ground——

Mr. MAHON. You will find it on page 5 of the report.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not based on this ground, that because we obtained the Philippine Islands from the Spanish Government we succeed to certain liabilities——

Mr. MAHON. I shall conclude my statement in a few moments, and if the gentleman will just wait, I will answer his question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to that, to get a settlement of this matter, that no future complications may arise, this is the letter of the Secretary of State, addressed to Mr. Tower, who, I suppose, is the secretary of legation:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 26, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. TOWER: Referring to your note of the 15th of July and to other correspondence which I have had the honor of exchanging with you and Sir Julian Pauncefote, I can only say, so far as the legal aspects of the case are concerned, that I am compelled to reiterate the opinion which I have heretofore made known to you of the law officers of the Government, that the Government of the United States is not in any way bound to reimburse the British Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company for damages and losses alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the cutting of its cable during the war with Spain, and, furthermore, there are no funds at the disposition of the President without the consent of Congress of making such payment.

But, in view of all the circumstances of the case, as a matter of equity and comity, the President is inclined to consider the question of reimbursement to that company of its actual expenses incurred in the repair of its cable to Hongkong after it was cut by the military officers of the United States.

I am, my dear Mr. Tower, very faithfully, yours,

JOHN HAY.

MR. REGINALD TOWER, etc.

Now, in pursuance of that letter, and of this agreement which they were trying to reach, the President addressed this message to the Senate and the House:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, with reference to the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain.

I recommend that as an act of equity and comity provision be made by the Congress for reimbursement to the company of the actual expenses incurred by it in the repair of the cables.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 16, 1900.

Mr. MAHON. Now I will answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MAHON. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Missouri first, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LLOYD. The question I asked was this: On what ground do they base a claim that the United States Government should make this payment?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that, so that the House may have the benefit of it as well as the gentleman, I will have the Clerk read the chief points in the opinion of the Queen's counsel. That will be a complete answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this is not the first of a series of like claims?

Mr. MAHON. I think there is only one more, for a cable that is somewhere on the shores of Cuba, but I do not know where.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That amounts to $40,000 as against $5,000 in this case.

Mr. MAHON. That bill is in my committee, and they have accepted the same thing as in this bill—that is, the actual expenses of repairing and renewing the cable. They had damages in the bill, but that has been settled.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is through, I want to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OPINION OF SIR ROBERT T. REID, Q. C., M. P., AND MR. HENRY SUTTON.

The rule usually acted upon is that neutral property permanently situated in belligerent territory must take its chance in war in common with the property of the belligerent.

But we think that when the property in question has an international character (as all submarine cables have, especially where, as in the present case, they form links in a wider system) the rule above mentioned ought not to be applied, and it has not in fact been applied in any case known to us. We consider that it is consistent with international usage as well as equitable in itself that the claim of this company should be entertained unless there are circumstances either in the relations between the Spanish Government and the company or in the actual conduct of the company's representatives sufficient to deprive it of the benefit of a neutral character.

It is worthy of note in this connection that the whole utility of the cable over, it may be, very many miles is as much destroyed by cutting it within territorial waters as by cutting it on the high seas, which last act would undoubtedly entitle its owners to compensation.

This consideration confirms and illustrates the international character which we have already said belongs in some degree to a submarine cable.

It remains to be considered whether the prima facie right to compensation is in the circumstances of this case affected by reason of the relations existing between the Spanish Government and the company at the outbreak of the war, or subsequently thereto, by the conduct of the company's representative.

The relations between the company and the Spanish Government depend upon the terms of the concession. These terms do not appear to us to be unreasonable in themselves, either for the Spanish Government to impose or for the company to accept, and are nothing more than the occasion upon which they were agreed to reasonably demanded.

As regards the conduct of the company's representatives, they were prevented by Spanish officers from entering into relations with the United States Admiral, and what was done under coercion can not be regarded as unfriendly, and though they might have allowed the United States Admiral to use their cable instead of preventing him by sealing the Hongkong end, there is no doubt that had they allowed its use it would have been a complete departure from a neutral attitude, and would most likely have entailed ruin if the Spaniards had recovered the Philippines.

No indemnity was offered by the United States, and it is not, in our opinion, a fair position to impose on a private company that they should be placed in a dilemma of being obliged to choose sides and expose themselves to ruin if the belligerent of their choice proves to be the unsuccessful belligerent.

There is nothing in all this to disentitle the company to compensation.

The only point which may be considered adverse to the claim of the company is as follows:

It appears to us that the Spanish Government was in fact using this cable for military purposes hostile to the United States, and we think it is open to question whether that circumstance did not warrant it being cut without compensation, as a necessary act of war, not because of the misconduct of the company, but because of a military necessity. If this had been ordinary property of neutrals, we think this point would have been fatal to this claim; but on the whole we consider that it does not apply to such property as this cable. And, further, it appears to us that the United States Admiral did not merely aim at preventing the use of the cable by the Spaniards, but also at using it for himself. Under these circumstances we think that the claim for compensation is legitimate and ought to be entertained.

With respect to the loss of traffic, we do not consider that a claim can be substantiated in respect of loss caused by the necessary disturbance of this as of other industrial pursuits in the time of war. The question as applied to a cable is of novel character and we can not say there is any precedent, but we think the proper conclusion is what we have stated.

The proper course to pursue in order to bring the company's claim before the Government of the United States will be for the company to prefer it through the foreign office.

R. T. REID.
HENRY SUTTON.

NOVEMBER 21, 1898.

Mr. MAHON. That is the only answer I can make the gentleman. Now I will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have asked all the questions I wish. I desire to be heard at the proper time.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will agree to this substitute?

Mr. MAHON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will read it. Amend the title so as to read: "Authorizing the Secretary of State to reimburse the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for expenses," striking out the words "compensation on account of," and striking out "pay the claim of;" and then have the bill read this way:

That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as an act of grace and comity, to reimburse an amount not exceeding $4,500 to the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut by United States forces during the war with Spain; and a sufficient sum of money, not exceeding $4,500, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse said company such expenses.

That would do away with an objection, as I think, which would establish a dangerous precedent and would recognize the bill as a valid claim against the United States.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I anticipated this objection myself, and I have this amendment prepared, which I will offer at the proper time, and that may answer the gentleman's purpose. I intended at the proper time to amend, in line 4, by striking out "to pay the claim of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "reimburse;" and in lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "for compensation" and insert in lieu thereof "as an act of comity and grace;" and after "expenses," in line 6, insert "not exceeding $4,500." Then the gentleman from New York can amend the title, which ought to be amended accordingly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; you leave in also, in lines 10 and 11, "to pay the claim;" and you leave in "compensation on account of," recognizing it, in fact, as a claim. I think, perhaps, you intended all right.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Better agree with thine adversary while he is in the way.

Mr. RAY of New York. That would carry out the idea of the President and of the Secretary of State, that it would be an act of grace.

Mr. MAHON. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the substitute if the gentleman will offer it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would accept an amendment which would provide that the British Government should pay the claims of American citizens against that Government "as an act of comity and grace?"

Mr. MAHON. Oh, while I may be in sympathy with the gentleman's position, this would not be the place to put it. I do not know whether there is anything in the claim.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do. The difficulty is, when claims are presented to this Government, they are paid; but when presented to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, they are simply talked about for years, and I am not ready to stand here and pay any of those claims until those that our own people have against that Government are considered as well. By and by I will state what those claims are.

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman will carefully examine the payment of claims and counterclaims between the United States and the British Government, he will find that this Government has a long-barreled shotgun in its hands. This Government has always received millions of dollars more than we have paid to them, and this Government always has been able and always will be able to make the British Government pay to her citizens what is legally due to them.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. This Government does not always succeed in doing it.

Mr. MAHON. Perhaps not, in a few isolated cases. A great many gentlemen in this country think they have claims, when they have no claim against any person.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have presented this case, I think, as fully as I need to, so that the House now thoroughly understands it. I am not going to weary the House with any long argument.

Summarized briefly, there is no doubt about the fact that that cable was cut. There is doubt that it cost at least $4,500 for repairs. There is no doubt that the people who owned this property were neutrals and were in no way hostile to our Government during that war.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I be pardoned to ask the gentleman a question in reference to this matter?

Mr. MAHON. In a moment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I merely wish to ask a question right on that point.

Mr. MAHON. The next step is that the British Government has presented this claim of her citizens through the proper governmental channels of England. The opinions of this high law officer, on account of his high position and great ability, must carry some weight.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to ask the gentleman one question in that connection. Why is it that this Congress should be governed by the opinions of Her Majesty's counsel rather than by the Attorney-General of the United States?

Mr. MAHON. Every gentleman ought to be controlled by the opinions of great legal men. I will come to that. Now, I say this——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I will stand up for my own country.

Mr. MAHON. There is no doubt that the position taken by the English Government, through its proper department, backed up by the legal opinions of her legal representatives, is what I have stated. Counsel for the Queen says we are responsible, not only for the actual repair, but for the damages arising from loss of business. This claim was presented to this Government, backed up by the authority of the British Government to present it, through the British ambassador. The Secretary of State very properly presented this claim to the Attorney-General, who is the law officer of this Government. He reviewed all the facts, and from his standpoint he said there was no liability on the part of this Government, either as to losses incurred or the expense of repairing the cable. Here we have an issue between the two Governments and opposite opinions from law officers.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to make an observation just there. If the gentleman is right, I should be disposed to vote against the payment of this claim, but I do not so understand it. I do not so understand it. These gentlemen who render this opinion, which, in my judgment, is a very thin one, are not the counsel of the British Government, but the counsel of this Australasia-China Telegraph Company; and so far from making a claim against this Government as a matter of right, the British ambassador trusts that our Government will be disposed to entertain this claim apart from strictly legal considerations and to adopt the equitable rule suggested by the Government in such cases. Now, if this were a claim put on the ground of right, I should vote against it. If it is on the other ground, I should be disposed to favor it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call the attention of my friend to the letter of the Secretary of State on that subject.

Mr. DALZELL. And, furthermore, as my colleague [Mr. RAY of New York] suggests in this connection, the Secretary of State says to the President:

It will be seen from the papers that no formal claim in behalf of the company is presented by Her Majesty's Government, but that that Government submits whether, as an act of grace, some pecuniary compensation may not be granted to the company for the loss which it alleges to have suffered in this regard.

And, furthermore, the President of the United States, in his message sending the papers to this House, says:

I recommend that as an act of equity and comity provision be made by the Congress for reimbursement to the company of the actual expenses incurred by it in the repair of the cable.

So that I think the claim is really before the House upon the ground of equity and not as a legal claim.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will understand that I am not insisting that there is any legal obligation on the part of the United States to pay either damages or the expenses incurred. I have not examined that part of it. This case, however, has come through the British ambassador, and has been sent here as stated. I do not know who Robert T. Reid is. Probably he is an ordinary counselor. The gentleman may be right about that. In looking over the papers I supposed he was the legal adviser of that department of the English Government.

Mr. RIDGELY. Do we understand that this claim has been submitted to our Attorney-General?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. And that he reports officially that we are not legally liable?

Mr. MAHON. He does.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He says that we are not legally bound.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was just going to state, this claim is not presented here by the Committee on War Claims. The committee have not so reported. They have offered no opinion, excepting the papers in the case, the opinion of the counsel for the claimant and the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States against that legal position. Then they present, further, the proposition made by the British ambassador that the proper way to settle this case is to get away from all things like legal distinctions and settle it as a matter of comity and grace between these claimants and the Government of the United States. In pursuance of that I had an amendment prepared reciting that we do not pay this as a matter of legal right, but merely as a matter of comity and grace that ought always to exist between friendly powers. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has offered a substitute which covers my amendment and makes the bill still safer, and I am willing to accept that substitute.

Mr. LLOYD. I wish to ask in this connection, suppose it had occurred that in the conflict between the United States and Spain the Philippine Islands had not come under the protectorate of the United States. Does the gentleman then hold that either in law or in equity we would be responsible for damages for acts which were committed as an incident to military operations?

Mr. MAHON. I do not insist that this claim now stands on any legal obligation to pay it.

Mr. LLOYD. Would you say that it stood as an equitable claim under those circumstances?

Mr. MAHON. Always, if there is any equity in it.

Mr. LLOYD. I should like to call attention, then, to the second opinion of Messrs. Reid and Sutton with reference to the liability on that account.

Mr. MAHON. Well, I have ignored their opinion and have accepted the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. LLOYD. Then you ignore the opinion of Mr. Sutton and Mr. Reid when they say we should pay on account of the fact that we obtained the Philippine Islands?

Mr. MAHON. I hope the gentleman will not make a speech in my time. If he will allow me, I will answer him. I am not pressing this bill on the legal opinion of Mr. Reid or Mr. Sutton. I can not press it as a legal obligation on this Government, because the Attorney-General of the United States has decided against it, and in his opinion we all ought to acquiesce; but we are presenting it on the ground that this was a neutral party, and the cable was cut as a military necessity; that the cable company suffered a great hardship and a great loss, and simply as a matter of comity existing between people who are friendly and as a matter of grace the Secretary of State and the President of the United States recommend that we pay this claim.

Mr. LLOYD. Then do you think it is the duty of the United States to pay all neutrals the damages that may come to them by reason of a war that may exist between nations?

Mr. MAHON. It would take too long to answer that question.

Mr. LLOYD. That is the logical sequence of your reasoning.

Mr. MAHON. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. MAHON. We have passed bills against this Government to pay thousands of dollars where there was no legal obligation, but simply as a matter of comity and grace.

Mr. RAY of New York. Do you know of any case similar to this?

Mr. MAHON. No; I do not say that. Now, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are on this bill considering an entirely new question. The rule of international law is well settled that if the property of a neutral is within the theater of military operations it must take its chance of destruction by military operations, and for that destruction the owner has no lawful claim against the belligerent government. I do not understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania disputes that proposition. On the other hand, he affirms it.

The cable of the claimant was cut by the orders of Admiral Dewey in the course of his naval operations. We are asked to pay as a matter of equity—I am not sure we ought not to pay it—a claim of the owner of the cable, based upon the opinion of its own counsel, who himself says that "the question is of a novel character and we can not say that there is any precedent for it." On the other hand, the Attorney-General of the United States is of the opinion that the claim is groundless in law. This claim will be followed by others of the same character. Everybody who remembers how every day the press contained accounts of some new cable-cutting operation by our Navy along the shores of Cuba during the late war understands very well that when we begin by paying one of these claims we shall have to pay them all. I noticed yesterday that the President sent to Congress a recommendation that we pay the claim of some company whose cable was cut upon the shores of Cuba, the claim amounting to between £800 and £900—a great deal larger claim than this.

Now, I think, if we are going to undertake to make compensation—and I again say I am not sure we ought not to do so in view of all the international circumstances which have existed during the past two years—we ought to do so deliberately. We ought to find out what the cases are and how many there are. We ought to have the fullest information on the subject from the State Department. For this reason when the proper time comes I shall offer by way of amendment to the bill a proposition to this effect:

That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to furnish Congress with full information as to the claims of citizens of the British Government against this Government and of citizens of the United States against the British Government.

While I am willing to do equity toward the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, I want Her Britannic Majesty's Government to do the same equity toward the citizens of the United States. I represent a district in which many of the people are in constant contact with the authority of the British Government, exercised through the Dominion of Canada. The conduct of the Canadian government for these many years toward those engaged in the American deep-sea fisheries is not pleasant to contemplate. It does not tend to increase the international good will which I should be glad to see. When I spoke of this matter before, some gentlemen asked me what case I had in mind.

I will state one of many, and one only. A man who by many years of toil upon the sea had gathered together money enough to own a little vessel of his own was fishing some years ago off the coast of Nova Scotia, more than 6 miles from any part of the mainland. He was fishing upon the high seas, upon God's highway, where American citizens have the same right as citizens of Great Britain. Desiring to be within the law, he learned from one Canadian cruiser that he was outside the 3-mile limit. Acting upon that information, he surrounded a school of mackerel with a seine. After he had caught the fish and secured them in his seine, but before he had landed them upon the deck of his schooner, a second Dominion cruiser came along and claimed that, although he had caught the fish upon the high seas, yet while they were in his seine and before he had landed them upon the deck of his vessel, he had drifted within the 3-mile limit and consequently within the jurisdiction of the Dominion government.

The owner of the American vessel protested and has always claimed that he was even at the time of seizure upon the high seas and beyond British jurisdiction; but his vessel was seized, condemned, and forfeited by a Canadian court, and the forfeiture was affirmed by the supreme court of the Dominion of Canada by a majority of one of the judges. It was admitted by the Crown that the fish were actually caught and secured in the seine upon the high seas, and the only claim upon which the forfeiture was based was that the mere drifting across the line with the fish in the seine attached to the vessel was an offense against British law. Yet, drawing a line from headland to headland at that part of the Nova Scotian coast, the point of seizure was 4½ miles outside the line thus drawn, and very much more than that beyond any point of the mainland of Nova Scotia.

The only manner in which the jurisdiction of the Canadian court could be sustained was by measuring from an isolated ledge, uninhabitable and without vegetation, over which the sea breaks in a high wind, and which projects from the bottom of the ocean. After a weary litigation the British Government offered to return the vessel to its owner, but upon the condition that costs should be paid, which were beyond his means and far exceeded the value of the vessel which had been left to decay and rot and go to ruin. This is the case of the Frederick Gerring, Jr., an American fishing vessel, owned by an American citizen, Edward Morris. Thus, not in time of war but in time of peace the savings of a lifetime, earned amid the perils of the sea, have been swept away. That is the claim against the British Government for which the Senators from my State and I have been haunting the chamber of the Secretary of State for years past. Before we sit here to do an act of grace to subjects of Great Britain, we ought in justice to our own people to compel Great Britain to do equity by us. [Loud applause.]

I hope that the substitute that I offer will be adopted by this committee. I hope that we shall proceed in this matter deliberately; that we shall find out what we owe in equity to the citizens of Great Britain and pay them, and find out at the same time what Great Britain owes to our citizens and compel her to pay them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MAHON. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, as this proposition comes to the House from the State Department, it comes in a very simple form. It is not embarrassed by any relation to the opinion of those English counselors. It does not undertake to set aside the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, whose opinion would be binding upon the State Department in any question. It comes from that Department of Government which is intrusted with our foreign affairs and with relations existing between this and other countries. It furthermore comes from a still higher authority, from the Executive Officer of our Government, the President of the United States.

Neither of these departments of the Government ask for the payment of any legal claim or for the recognition of any legal liability on the part of this Government. On the contrary, it is specially excluded, and it is asked to be done as an act of grace between this country and the inhabitants of Great Britain. The question of liability incurred on cables is a new one in international law, and there has been no ruling to amount to anything on that question so far. Therefore, it is a delicate subject for any government to commit itself upon, and it should be proceeded with very slowly.

I think the amendment, or substitute, offered by the gentleman from New York makes it very plain that this is nothing but an act of grace on matters arising between the two countries and will not tend to establish any precedent, which the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to fear. Any country that performs any act of grace in so doing distinctly states it is purely an act of grace and comity between the nations, which precludes it from ever being quoted as a precedent for cases that may come afterwards. I have full sympathy with what the gentleman from Massachusetts says, that our Government should insist upon the collection of every claim due us from Great Britain, but I would submit to the fair judgment of this House if a good way to do that is not to show that we are willing to be fair with claims coming from our own State Department, indorsed by the Executive, and that they should be granted an appropriation for this act of comity? Let us set an example as to the way our Government seems desirous of doing, and they may follow it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But they do not follow, Mr. Chairman. We keep setting an example, and they keep refusing to follow it.

Mr. ADAMS. That is a statement that the gentleman might not be able to sustain with facts. He has referred to the fishery question, which is one that has involved a long consultation between this country and Great Britain. It is not only limited there, but it is also a dispute in regard to France. The gentleman has touched upon a question that is very open and debatable, and however much there may be in individual cases that exist that would appeal to our sympathies, still it is not fair to bring up a question that has been long debated and never finally settled as a set-off to a claim which the Executive of our Government and the State Department, which is intrusted with this particular phase of our Government, comes and asks the Congress of the United States to grant.

Furthermore, the ambassador of Great Britain, in his communication to the State Department, distinctly makes no claim. He asks it as an act of comity and equity, and the word equity in this connection must not be confounded with the word equity in law. It simply means equity as justice between two nations. Therefore we will establish no precedent, and when that Department to which our foreign relations is intrusted—the State Department, and further indorsed and supported by the Executive of our country, the President—asks the House as an act of comity and justice between two nations to grant a small sum of $5,000, I think it would ill-befit us not to respond to the Executive in that particular, in order that we may show our good will and feeling in this matter, and set an example to other nations, which we have been doing lately in such a high degree on other matters as to prove that we stand ready to repair any act we have done that can not be sustained with established precedent and fullest right of international law.

Mr. MAHON. As I before stated, I have no intention of pressing a vote on this bill. I think it ought to be discussed. I now want to reserve the balance of my time for the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. MAHON. As there does not appear to be any opposition to the bill, I suppose the gentleman will be recognized in his own time.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask to be recognized in my own time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not exactly in sympathy with all that might be said in opposition to the action of the English Government in regard to this claim, or with all that has been said on that subject by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Englishmen move slowly always. In the war in South Africa we have an exemplification of that fact, for they are now moving with exceeding deliberation to the relief of Ladysmith. And if they are acting with deliberation there, what can we expect in the matter of claims for the compensation of American citizens? I think, as a rule, Englishmen and the English Government endeavor to be just in their dealings with the United States and with the citizens of the United States.

What the facts are in relation to the claim to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] has called attention I do not know, but if there is justice in the claim I have no doubt that justice will be done in due time. As this bill originally came before the House for consideration this morning I was opposed to it in almost every feature, because it recognized a claim of this company and a liability to pay that claim, and thereby to establish a most dangerous precedent. We have here the case of a foreign company, or, I assume, a foreign corporation, composed entirely of citizens of China and citizens of Great Britain. When the war with Spain broke out they were the owners of a cable line between the island of Luzon, entirely within the Kingdom of Spain, and Hongkong, which was within the jurisdiction of Great Britain or China. I take it Spain had nothing to do with the line, except as she had granted the privilege to this company to land the cable. I understand that the Government of Spain had no ownership in the line. Is that true?

Mr. MAHON. I so understand.

Mr. RAY of New York. Therefore we have a claim made by citizens of China and of Great Britain for damage to their property done by the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the war. This property damaged was not entirely situate within Spanish territory, within the theater of military operations, and it was not exclusively under the Spanish flag. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a great deal that may be said in favor of the enactment of this measure into law. It seems to me that it would be wise and just to recognize this claim, as the President of the United States has done by recommending, as an act of grace, simply and purely, recognizing the rights of these citizens, that we make some compensation.

And it seems to me, furthermore, that there is a great deal of wisdom in the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], which is that before enacting any measure of this kind into law we ask the Secretary of State to furnish us with a list of all claims of this character that have been brought to the attention of the Government of the United States; that he give us the history of the circumstances connected with the damage done by our Government or military forces to all of these cable lines connected with Cuba and Puerto Rico, Luzon, and any other point where we may have had occasion to interfere with these great means of international communication, these cable lines.

I take it that we could not find a precedent anywhere that would sustain us either in refusing to pay such a claim or in paying it, and it is a matter that will involve the payment, I think, before we get through with the subject, of at least a million dollars; that is the way I understand the matter. I understand that one claim, aside from this one, has already been presented to the Government of the United States which involves in the neighborhood of half a million dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would say, with all respect to the chairman of the committee who reported this claim—and I notice that he wrote the report himself—that it seems to me this bill had better lie by and be withdrawn from the consideration of the committee until some future occasion, and that an inquiry be made into all these claims, all the circumstances connected with them, and that this committee having the subject in charge give it most careful attention, examine the legal propositions connected with it, examine the precedents relating to the subject, and make a full report to this House that will inform us just where we stand—in other words, so that when we come to consider this subject we may know "where we are at." I understand, of course, that this is a very small matter——

Mr. MAHON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me now to make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will yield, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that I have the floor when this matter comes up again.

And then, on motion of Mr. MAHON, the committee rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. STEELE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6909) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE VICE-PRESIDENT HOBART.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] offers the resolutions which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of GARRET A. HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

[Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy the attention of the House but a very few minutes.

Vice-President HOBART is dead. The nation was profoundly startled at the sad announcement. When we last saw him he was apparently in robust and vigorous health; but the black-robed messenger of death beckoned from the hilltops, and he followed with the dying to an eternal rest. I knew him well. I attended his marriage to one of the most delightful young women in our community. Now she is his sorrow-laden widow, cloistered in gloom and loneliness.

His administration was unique, and the unusual friendship existing between the dead Vice-President and our distinguished

President was of the tenderest kind, and gave him personally and officially a dignity and importance herebefore lacking, and raised the office of Vice-President from one of perfunctory faculty to an exalted power. In early life he gave emphatic promise of future wealth and greatness.

Our deeds do follow us from afar;
And what we have been makes us what we are.

He possessed greater business capacity and executive ability than any man I ever knew. He loved wealth and power, and dispensed both liberally. As the great poet says:

The time of life is short;
To spend it basely were too long.

His neighbors and friends best know how his shortened time of life was spent. Midas-like, everything he touched turned to gold, and his genial, robust, and cheerful appearance loaded him down with preferment and power. But it is not to the dead our words should be alone or particularly addressed, but to the widowed wife and son who must carry this burden of sorrow throughout a lifetime. To this grand widow and stricken boy let our hearts go out with tenderness, sympathy, and love, and appeal to the Almighty, who is especially the widows' God, to strengthen her in her loneliness for all struggles to come; and when she approaches the eternal throne may she bid a fond adieu to this world to embrace her beloved husband in the life everlasting.

In this life there is a continual parting—by death, marriage, absence; all are profoundly sad; but death is saddest, for it is for life. How pathetic does our own great poet sing of this sad truth:

All are scattered now and fled,
Some are married, some are dead;
And when I ask, with throbs of pain—
"Ah! when shall they all meet again,
As in the days long since gone by?"
The ancient timepiece made reply:
"Forever—never;
Never—forever."

Never here, forever there,
Where all parting, pain, and care,
And death, and time shall disappear,
Forever there, but never here,
The horologe of eternity
Sayeth this incessantly,
"Forever—never;
Never—forever."

Soon as age greets us we have more friends in eternity than here; and when we are required to depart, death's journey is made easier by this thought. God grant we may all view life as a very transient state and always regard the star of eternity as soon to surround us in its effulgent rays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with GARRET A. HOBART began on the day he was nominated to the office of Vice-President at St. Louis. His quiet, cordial, winsome greeting when I first met him lingered in my memory long after an acquaintance had ripened into a lasting friendship. I desire to add my testimony to those noble qualities of head and heart that characterized our late Vice-President.

In our system of government the Vice-President occupies an anomalous and ofttimes uncomfortable position. His is an office of high rank, carrying with it the greatest possibilities of political heirship and yet bringing little power or responsibility. He is the presiding officer of the Senate, and is chosen for that august body and not by them. He has the right to vote only in case of a tie; he rarely has an opportunity to exercise this right while he presides over the deliberations of the Senate. In exercising the prerogatives of a presiding officer he can never be a potent factor, but is alway the servant of the Senate.

It is to be regretted that in our political system more important duties and greater responsibility could not have been imposed upon an office of such high rank. The duties of the office should have been in keeping with its great possibilities. In case of a vacancy, he is the constitutional successor of the highest officer in our system. Only a single life stands between him and the Presidency. While he is clothed with the high rank and dignity of presiding over one coordinate branch of Congress, he is shorn of responsibility and power. He has no place in the Cabinet counsels of the Executive. He can not raise his voice in debate in the Senate; he can not vote on the questions, great or small, that come before that body unless the Senators happen to be equally divided. He has no influence there or elsewhere, except that which comes from his own personality; scarcely more than he would exercise as a private citizen. Often his position is scarcely more enviable than that of the heir apparent to a European throne.

In the early days of the Republic great care was taken in the selection of candidates for this office. The fact that this officer was the constitutional successor to the Presidency whenever a vacancy happened seemed to be the all-pervading influence in the naming of the Vice-President. Down to 1804 the Constitution distinctly recognized this principle. The electors voted for two persons. The one receiving the greatest number was chosen President, and he who received the second greatest was chosen Vice-President. Under this provision John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were each chosen Vice-President and each succeeded, by election to the Presidential office, the President with whom they had previously been chosen as Vice-President. In like manner at a later period Martin Van Buren also succeeded the President under whom he had served as Vice-President. This method of selection was changed by the amendment of 1804, owing to an unfortunate complication which arose under the old system. But the reason still existed why a candidate for the Vice-Presidency should be in all respects equal to the emergency should he succeed to the Presidency.

Since the change in the constitutional method of selection less care has been taken, as a general rule, in the selection of the Vice-President. Frequently the question of fitness has been sacrificed to that of availability. After hot and bitter strife within the party the Vice-Presidency has sometimes been thrown as a matter of consolation to appease a disappointed and defeated faction. The President always represents the predominant thought and principles of his party; his possible successor should be chosen for the same reason. He ought not to be the exponent of the tendencies of the minority. His selection ought not to be the result of a desire simply to gain more votes for the ticket.

GARRET A. HOBART did much to restore the office to its old-time dignity and rank. No one who knew him well doubted his fitness and ability to fill with honor to himself and to the lasting glory of his country the place of its Chief Executive. He had the ability, the tact, the statesmanship to take a high place in the long line of illustrious men who have served their country in the greatest office in all the world.

Mr. HOBART, not officially, but by the force of his character, was a part of the Administration. His counsels were listened to in the executive chamber, and his voice was heeded in legislative halls. May his successor be of the same high character and intellectual endownment, amply qualified for all the emergencies which the Constitution has imposed upon the office.

GARRET A. HOBART exemplified the typical life of a successful American boy. He worked his way through college and won the right to practice in the courts of his State by dint of hard work and on the meager pay as a teacher in the public schools. The school teacher became a lawyer at the age of 25, and this was the beginning of his success, culminating in the Vice-Presidency at the age of 53. While engaged in an active and exacting profession, he found time to enter into the councils of his party and perform all the duties of an American citizen. Courage, common sense, ability, and persevering work brought success in every sphere of his usefulness. Responsibilities multiplied upon him, but, like every busy man, he found time for all.

No interest intrusted to his care was ever neglected. His fellow-citizens honored him and he honored them in the faithful and conspicuous discharge of private and official duties. He was successively presiding officer of each branch of the legislature of his own State. His advice was eagerly sought by clients and party managers. And with all the burden of responsibility he found time for his social duties, his family, and his church. He passed away in the ripe maturity of his powers, seemingly in the day of his greatest possibilities and power, yet it was the close of a life abounding in influence and full of honorable achievements.

As presiding officer of the Senate, he has had few equals and no superior. He seldom left the chair during the session of the Senate, was always fully informed as to the progress of business, never shirked the responsibility of a decision, was ever courteous, tactful, and ready, and with all just and honest. He was respected by political friend and foe alike.

In these few words, Mr. Speaker, I have sought, as it were, to place a single flower on the grave of GARRET A. HOBART. His life work, how worthily and well done, the whole nation bears witness. His days were full of usefulness and crowned with honor. His last victory was his best; it was the victory of the Christian's faith. As he calmly bade his family farewell, and with courage turned to meet the great destroyer, it was with the calm confidence in a new life, unnumbered by the years. His death was the crowning triumph of his successful life. Verily, "His works do follow him."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a member of this House I have very seldom taken any part in such exercises as engage our attention to-day. I have never felt that it was my duty to speak when speech would necessarily be only perfunctory. I have felt that the language of eulogy is too often the language of extravagance, and that this is the more apt to be so when it is the result of a seeming regard for the demands of propriety than when it is an answer to the promptings of an appreciative regard. Propriety suggests that we should put upon record our estimate of the nation's loss sustained in the death of the Vice-President; but if that were all that appealed to me to-day, I should remain silent and leave to others the duty of formulating that estimate.

I come to bring my humble tribute to the memory of GARRET

A. HOBART because of my personal esteem for him, because of my admiration of his career, and because I believe him to have been a high type of American manhood, illustrating in his life the splendid possibilities of American citizenship.

As may be said of many Americans—perhaps of the most who are successful—he was the architect of his own fortune. And yet we are not prepared to say of all who thus achieve success that their lives command our admiration. It is the means by which the success is attained that challenges a place in our regard.

Mr. HOBART had sterling qualities of character—industry, the love of work that brings experience; the wisdom that turns that experience to account in the seizure and improvement of opportunities; the desire to excel that, faithfully pursued, insures excellence; the integrity and strength of character, the fixedness of purpose, and the healthy ambition that sooner or later bring distinction to their possessor and make him a marked man among his fellows.

He was a successful man in every sphere that he entered, and the story of his life has to do with many and varied spheres. He realized success not because of mere accident of fortune or of opportunity, but by reason, above all, of the possession of those faculties and traits of character that appeal to the confidence of men. He attained eminence as a business man. He accumulated wealth and shared it with others. His was the guiding mind in large projects and enterprises whose success meant not only individual but the general weal. He was a public-spirited man. As his means grew so he grew in mind and character. He shared his good fortune with others. His hand was open as his heart was warm.

He had the conception of a broad-minded man as to his duties and responsibilities. He was one of those who conscientiously assume the burdens and face the duties of citizenship. He knew that good government is an individual affair, that there can be no honest mass unless there be honest particles. And so he gave of his time and of his means to the choice of good men to office. It was regardless of selfish purposes that he took place himself at the call of his fellows; for with him private interest yielded to public, and public office was a public trust.

As the years went by the sphere of his usefulness and of his influence grew. He became a leading man in his city, in his neighborhood, in his State, and at last in the nation.

He was the law adviser of his city. He was more than once a member of his State legislature, and its speaker. He was for six years a member of his State senate, and its president. He was the nominee of his party for a seat in the United States Senate. He was Vice-President of the United States. In all these various positions of trust he so bore himself that few could criticise, no one blame, and all must praise.

He was a recognized power in his church. He was benevolent and beneficent, exercising an influence for good among high and low, rich and poor, to the remotest places to which that influence reached. And how many those places were only those can tell to whom his departure came with a sense of personal loss.

It is not for us to penetrate the sacred precincts and attempt to measure the void made there where he was loved and loving husband and father, counselor, and bosom friend.

Mr. HOBART'S was a well-rounded character. He was a well-poised man; evenly developed on all sides, remarkably free from faults, and well equipped with the everyday virtues that count for so much in making life happy for those around us.

But it is the crowning glory of Mr. HOBART'S life and that which makes secure his place in history that during his incumbency of the Vice-Presidency of the United States he restored to that office its old-time dignity and honor. He gave to this generation a conception of that office which for many previous generations had faded from the minds of men.

The framers of the Constitution intended that the qualifications for President and for Vice-President should be identical. Inasmuch as upon the death of the President the Vice-President succeeds him, no reason appeared to their minds why the candidates for these offices should not in all respects be equals, and so the Constitution provided that the electors should vote for two persons, and that the one having the highest number of votes should be President and the next in number the Vice-President. So John Adams was chosen as the first Vice-President, and subsequently Thomas Jefferson as the second Vice-President, and both were chosen as Presidents upon the expiration of their respective terms. Since their day only one single man has been chosen President of the United States who had previously served as Vice-President, and that was Martin Van Buren. And yet we have learned in four cases—those of Tyler, Fillmore, Johnson, and Arthur, who each succeeded to the Presidency on the death of the President—how essential it is that the Vice-President should be as well equipped for the first office as is the man chosen for the first office himself.

The alarm occasioned by the rivalry between Jefferson and Aaron Burr in the election of 1800, when Burr almost succeeded to the Presidency, moved our fathers to amend the Constitution and to provide for the selection of a President as such and a Vice-President as such. At the time of this change in our system there were not wanting those who, measured by subsequent events, have been proven to be true prophets. In the debate in the House in 1803 upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution Mr. Roger Griswold said:

> The President is elected for four years. He may die within that period, he may be removed from office, or he may become disqualified to perform its duties. In either of these events the Vice-President succeeds to the power. Under the existing arrangement you will secure, as far as human prudence can accomplish it, the most eminent men for these two offices. Each candidate must be voted for as President, and if the electors fairly execute the Constitution they will give their votes for those men who are the best qualified to administer the Government. Thus under every probable event you will find one of the most eminent of your citizens at the head of your Government.
> But if the amendment prevails, the case must be greatly changed. The man voted for as Vice-President will be selected without any decisive view to his qualifications to administer the Government. The office will generally be carried into the market to be exchanged for the votes of some large States for President. And the only criterion which will be regarded as a qualification for the office of Vice-President will be the temporary influence of the candidates over the electors of his State. It is in this manner you must expect to obtain a man to fill the second office in the Government and who must succeed to the power of President upon every vacancy. The momentary views of party may perhaps be promoted by such arrangements, but the permanent interests of the country are sacrificed.

In how many national conventions have we seen the realizations of these forebodings! In how many conventions have we seen men chosen as Vice-Presidential candidates without any controlling regard to their fitness for the office of President, but simply because of expediency and availability for ulterior purposes! The consequence has been a lowering of the dignity of the second office in the Government in the minds and estimate of the people, and a consequent diminution of the power and dignity pertaining to the office itself. And while our Vice-Presidents, as a rule, have been distinguished men, they have acquiesced in the popular estimate, and have sought no wider sphere or broader duties than pertain to the Presidency of the Senate.

To this rule Mr. HOBART was a conspicuous exception. He brought to the administration of his office a lofty conception of the place, and a feeling of personal interest in and sympathy with legislation. His strong personality pervaded the Senate Chamber. His clear convictions, his earnestness, his patriotism, made themselves felt upon his associates. He was not a looker-on, but an actor, an efficient instrument in the administration of governmental affairs. Unlike his predecessors, he did not stand apart from responsibility. He had the confidence of the President; he participated in the councils of the Cabinet; he helped to shape and mold policies and direct events. He kept abreast of the times and had Providence so decreed he could at any moment have taken up the task had the President been compelled to lay it down.

It was his fortune to live in stirring times, to participate in grave events. He belonged to an Administration that will mark a new epoch in American history and shape for good or ill our future destiny. Of that Administration he was a part. Toward the shaping of that destiny he contributed his share of counsel and control. He magnified his office. He taught the people to estimate it as he estimated it. He taught us all a lesson that I doubt not will bring results in our future history. He restored the Vice-Presidency to the place in our system that it held in the system of the fathers.

And so when death claimed him all the people mourned his loss. They said of him as we say of him: He was a good man, a good citizen, a loyal friend, our great Vice-President.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker—

> Sir Launcelot, there thou lyest; thou were never matched by none earthly knight's hands; thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode a horse; thou were the kindest man that ever struck with a sword.—La Morte d'Arthur.

The Arabs had a saying that death is a camel that kneels at every man's door. This expresses how common an event it is in the providential order, as common and familiar as birth; yet of all natural events it produces the most profound and lasting impression upon the mind. This is true even when it comes to the humble and undistinguished; much more so when it overtakes those eminent persons who have achieved honor and distinction in the public service and occupy positions of great elevation in the public eye and in general esteem.

The death of the gifted and great has always been and will ever be a solemn, impressive, and imposing circumstance. Its value in the way of example, admonition, and instruction is in proportion to the elevation from which the subject falls to his natural end. It comes to the surviving like a faithful schoolmaster with the open book of a closed life and assigns the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching. The fame of the great and noble dead is among the most enduring and valuable of our public possessions, and the contemplation of their example and their virtues exerts a salutary and ennobling influence upon the living.

It is one of the very best of men—and there is no higher praise—that we contemplate to-day. It is the universal estimation, the consensus of opinion among those who knew him, that the late Vice-President, in the essential elements of a well-organized being and the necessary excellencies of a character of the very first rank, had few, if any, superiors. The high success he achieved, the eminence he attained, the perfect character he formed, were not due to any adventitious aids. Neither birth nor rank nor fortune smoothed his upward way to the clear-aired heights he reached and kept. True, he had the good fortune to be born in a country one of whose glories is that its social formation is not in horizontal strata common in the Old World, through which few ever pass from below upward, but is mobile as the sea, where the lowest drop, winged with merit, may rise and glitter on the highest wave that rolls. All else was due to principles, qualities, and forces which summed up a strong, interesting, and attractive personality.

If the limits of the occasion permitted, we could easily name the traits which were chief agencies in the development of his splendid manhood. Honor, sympathy, courage, and duty were the precious and conspicuous jewels in the crown of his superb character, and we may set them apart to-day and lift them over his new-made grave as the golden texts in the lesson of his life.

Some one has said he had an unusual capacity for winning affection. This was due to his deep human sympathy. He was not deficient in imagination and could place himself in the position of others and realize their distresses and their needs. His kindness to every human creature was proverbial. He was happy in promoting the comfort of those who served him. In his business career, which was a conspicuous success, his example if followed would cure two maladies said to afflict our time—the envious hatred of him who suffers want and the selfish forgetfulness of him who lives in affluence. This problem can be solved by sympathy, love, and good will.

There is no sunshine like that of kindness to open those beautiful flowers, sympathy, love, hope, and trust, which ought to bloom over the garden walls which separate the rich and the poor. Mr. HOBART was thoroughly imbued with that beautiful sentiment which holds the human family in the bonds of unity and love, "that we are children of the same Father, traveling toward the same home, and hoping to sit down at last at the same banquet, and therefore we should love one another."

So many gods, so many creeds,
So many ways so hard to find,
When all this wicked world needs
Is just the art of being kind.

Our distinguished friend has been twice ennobled. Death and duty ennoble all men. Devotion to duty was one of his characteristic traits. Her command to him a "Thus saith the Lord." He was unremitting in his attention to his public engagements. His entire life exemplified the truth that the path of duty is the upward way; that—

Not once or twice in our fair land's story
The path of duty was the way to glory.

Our souls should bow before the temple that enshrines the divinity of duty. These superb characters are the rarest fruit of earth, and their surviving countrymen may well cherish the fine vintage of their example for their perpetual refreshment.

The Vice-President, whom we mourn, was stricken in the midst of his usefulness from the highest public place save one in the gift of the people, a position which, despite its elevation, he honored more than it could honor him. The character and relative eminence of the office of Vice-President has been the subject of diverse comment for a hundred years, many people regarding it as quite subordinate in consequence and rank. The original constitutional mode of selecting the President and Vice-President denoted the estimation in which the framers of the Constitution held the Vice-Presidential office, and yet some of them and their contemporaries spoke slightingly of that office. John Adams said:

My country has in its wisdom contrived for us the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived or his imagination conceived.

Thomas Jefferson said:

It is the only office in the world about which I am unable to decide whether I had rather have it or not have it.

Whatever rank may have been assigned to it at different periods of our history, it is the glory of its last incumbent that he restored the Vice-Presidency to its true rank, redeemed it from any obscurity into which it may have fallen, rescued it from the insignificance in which it came to be regarded by some, and established its title to the dignity and elevation appropriate to the second office in the gift of the American people.

It is thus seen what a beautiful and instructive career has closed on earth. He did not live man's appointed time. The mysterious clock to which Dr. Holmes so beautifully refers, which the angel of life wound up to run three score years and ten, ran down before the lapse of the allotted time. But the bounds which are fixed to the duration of life do not always measure its worth. His career, though cut off in the midst of its usefulness, has been a sweet and wholesome example in right living, high thinking, and unselfish service in private and public walks of life, and his fragrant memory will ever remain an inspiration to those who loved him living and mourn him dead.

There is a tradition that among the Seneca Indians a singularly beautiful belief prevailed that when a loved one died, if they caught a singing bird and, binding it with messages of love and affection, released it over the grave of the departed, it would not fold its wings nor close its eyes until it reached the spirit land and delivered the messages to the loved and lost. So may the friends who mourn to-day bind with messages of love the birds that are singing in their hearts songs of homage and affection, and, releasing them at the grave of the departed, may enjoy the solace of believing that they will not fold their wings until they reach the spirit land and deliver the messages to the loved and lost.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not have the good fortune to enjoy a long and intimate acquaintance with the illustrious man whose memory and deeds we honor here to-day. Death is a theme not lightly to be mentioned by those who are subject to its power; for the young may die, the old must die, and the wisest of us know not how soon. In the prime of years, in the full strength of manhood apparently, and with short notice, Vice-President HOBART was called hence. As already stated, my acquaintance with him being limited, I shall not attempt to speak at length in respect to his private character and inner life. I leave these remarks to be made by those who knew him longer and more intimately. We learn that he was born in New Jersey in 1844; that he spent all the years of his busy life in that State; that in early manhood he followed the profession of school-teacher, and later became a lawyer.

The first public office he held was that of attorney for the city of Paterson, where he resided, in 1871. That later he was counsel of the board of freeholders of his county; that he was several times chosen a member of the legislature of his State, serving in both branches thereof, and filling the presiding officer's chair in each body. Once when his party was in the minority in the legislature he was voted for as its nominee for the United States Senate. In 1896, at St. Louis, he was nominated for Vice-President, and was duly elected in November of that year. The same month three years later he died.

During the comparatively brief time I have had the honor to occupy a seat in the House of Representatives I have witnessed the death of two incumbents of the Vice-President's chair. The first was that of the highly favored son of Indiana, Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks. He died in November, 1885. While Vice-President HOBART had not figured or participated in the public affairs of the nation at large so extensively as had Mr. Hendricks, yet in the narrower field of his State politics he was idolized to the same passionate extent. As there was nothing in the gift of the people of Indiana too good for Mr. Hendricks, so the people of New Jersey felt that Mr. HOBART richly deserved their warmest affection and most exalted honors.

In my personal experience in public life I have met but few men more easily approached and more civil and courteous in intercourse than was the late Vice-President. I recall well the first time I met him, shortly after he entered upon his duties as presiding officer of the Senate. The circumstances of our meeting made it necessary for me to speak to him without the formality of an introduction. I was immediately impressed with his mild manner, his dignified and pleasing address and polite attention. Gifted as he was in these respects, it is not singular or strange that he was personally popular and was held in such affectionate regard by those who knew him best.

He was blessed with a large estate, which he had amassed by an active life and successful business methods and management. He was enabled thereby to entertain, and he dispensed his hospitality in an almost lavish manner. This he did not for the mere sake of entertaining, but because of his generous and purely hospitable nature and the disposition to give good cheer and contribute to the comfort, happiness, and pleasure of those around him. He was, nevertheless, a man of duty, and rarely failed of success in any undertaking. This was because of his great energy, unflagging industry, good judgment, earnest convictions, and sound common sense. As the presiding officer of the United States Senate he was unusually successful and popular. By many members of that body he was pronounced a model presiding officer.

It can be truly said of him that in all the circumstances and conditions of life in which he was placed he bore himself well, and did no act to provoke the unfriendly criticisms of partisan opponents or to mortify a friend. I had the honor to attend his funeral services at his home, and I shall never forget the impressiveness of the scene there. It seemed that every man, woman, and child in his home city and, indeed, for miles around came to do him honor and pay a tribute of respect to his memory. There was scarcely standing room in Paterson that day, and all were moved with pity and sorrow, the highest evidence of sincere and genuine affection for their honored dead. Though ill for many months, we learn he bore his illness with fortitude and quiet resignation. He never lost his heart or became impatient. He knew his end was approaching, but he contemplated the fact with that sublime confidence which belongs only to those who rely upon a past life marked by purity of conduct, integrity of action, Christian piety, and religious convictions. The Vice-President is dead, but his example in public and in private life is left to us all as a priceless heritage. As I close this brief tribute the poet's description of how a man should live comes to my mind, for I believe he so lived:

So live that when thy summons comes,
Thou can take thy place with patriarchs, prophets, and the blest,
Gone up from every land to people in heaven,
And when that mighty caravan which halts one night time
In the vale of death shall strike its white tents for the morning march,
Thou shalt mount onward to the eternal hills,
Thy feet unweary and thy strength renewed,
Like the strong eagle for his upward flight.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, GARRET A. HOBART was born June 3, 1844, and died November 21, 1899, at the age of 55 years. During this comparatively short life he did well his part as husband and father, as counselor and friend to high and low, at the bar, in the legislature of his native State, in the conduct of great business enterprises, as a leader in politics, and finally as President of the Senate and Vice-President.

His death brought tributes of love, grief, and honor from a nation. The words of the great men in the Senate as to their young President read as if they had lost a Nestor. The speech of a Senator who had been at the head of a great railroad recalls that Mr. HOBART had been the arbitrator of traffic between the railroad systems of the whole country. He says:

No judge ever held office by so precarious a tenure or had to decide more important matters. There can be no more significant tribute to his unfailing judgment, tact, and character than the remarkable fact that there was never an appeal from his decisions or complaint of their fairness or justice.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that in two short years "he restored the Vice-Presidency to its proper position, and lifted it up before the people to the dignity and importance which it merits;" that he lifted it out of neglect and misconception, and made himself part of the Administration as one of the President's friends, advisers, and supporters.

Other Senators say:

"His close attachment for the President was as rare as it was generous and beautiful."

"The Vice-President loved justice. His sense of fairness made him the friend of the people and the people his friend."

"He appeared not to be an ambitious man, but carried wisdom and justice in his bosom, and friendship in his heart; love for his fellow-man and for his country."

"As he loved us, so we love and revere his memory."

A close friend, who knew and loved him, has said that it was a peculiarity of Mr. HOBART that he never made a mistake; that he seemed to know intuitively what to do, and when he once made a friend he never made the mistake of losing that friend.

Governor Roosevelt says:

With great titular rank he was not supposed to have any active share in formulating the policy of the Government and helping carry it through. What he did was done, not by force of position, but by force of character, his rare tact, his extraordinary common sense, and the impression of sincerity he created upon every man with whom he was brought in contact.

These and like sentiments, said here and elsewhere, are not common utterances, nor made by ordinary men. They speak the love and admiration which our friend's character inspired in all who knew him, and tell us the fact that he was not one of a class of great men, but that his work and character were unique. His was a rare union of qualities not ordinarily found in one man. He was active, but calm; earnest and judicious; wise, simple, and modest; witty, but never in derision; kind and gentle, yet courageous; a partisan, but absolutely fair; a skillful politician, yet entirely true; severely honest, but never puritanical; sweet as a good woman and strong as a true man, and loved with the affection that we give to each.

One can not paint the rainbow, nor will words depict the blending qualities which make up an arched and rounded character and which shade into each other so imperceptibly that even in looking at the man it can not be seen where one ends and the other begins. His sun is set and the rainbow is gone forever. We can not portray it to those who have not seen it, but we remember its presence as a joyful memory, bringing the world nearer to the sky. He was perhaps most remarkable in that he was always at his best, never failing in instinctive and instant perception as to what should be said or done, and what should be left unsaid or not done. His business energy was wonderful. His letters were always answered and his table clear, and his friends wondered when it was accomplished. He always had the time to see a friend, even when the stress of nations brought perplexity to the wisest.

Those who were with him at St. Louis know how calm he was before his nomination. He had felt the pulse of the political situation so distinctly that he calmly expected his nomination, and said so. Yet when it came, he was for a while as if overwhelmed. He realized instantly the change in his life, the greatness of his new duties and of the place that he had to fill—the stand which must be taken and the responsibility that was upon him. He shrank from public welcomes and retired to the counsels of his own heart. And when he spoke, a single sentence of his brief letter of acceptance rang through the country like a trumpet as he manfully proclaimed his belief that a dollar could not be made of "fifty-three cents' worth of silver plus a legislative fiat."

Such a sentence tells of his character more than any description. His simplicity of thought, his "veracity of mind" (as the Senator from Massachusetts terms it), his lightning and enlightening perception of facts, his simple statement of the issue, his power to put volumes of financial argument into a phrase, and, above all, his political truth and courage—all these appear written in that sentence as if in the handwriting on the wall. Those who then lived with him know what resolution it took to put and keep that sentence in his letter, how many of the wisest wished to disguise the issue, and what influences he had to meet and conquer. In it is seen, too, his political insight, then, as always, instinctive and unerring. From that moment the nation knew him as a leader.

He was born to be such, for he always dealt with realities and with great issues, and not with little ones. He faced what had to be done. He decided instantly, when others reasoned or doubted, and was never entangled with words or phrases.

Like all great leaders, he also knew men, and loved them as men, and recognized the best that was in them. He was informed not only by wide experience, but by a universal sympathy with others, that enabled him to know the mind and heart of the nation.

The office of Vice-President, carrying with it no official duty except to preside in the Senate, and no power except that of the casting vote in case of a tie, gave to him opportunity to bring all branches of the Government closer together. In the century of national life the Senate has grown from 26 to 90 and the House from 65 to over 350, while the details and departments of the work of the Executive and of the courts have grown until this great Government, in its various branches, is hardly to be recognized as the offspring of the simple assemblage of gentlemen who first met under the Constitution.

Naturally these branches have grown apart. It was Mr. HOBART'S work to bring each nearer to the other and to the nation. By his loving friendship with the President, by the relations which he maintained with men of all parties in the Senate, by his close affiliation with the House and with the leaders of national politics, he was enabled to bring each in touch with the other. All consulted him and wished to know his opinion. All trusted him. Senate and House, the Executive, the Army and Navy, the judges and the diplomats, were drawn closer together and felt how much he made for mutual confidence and peace.

If dispute threatened a deadlock, his advice was sought by men of the most various opinions. His decisions were accepted because he was known to be always true and fair. "He had a perfect genius for friendship." His influence in the Senate was almost unbounded, and yet he never infringed the privileges of that body. His advice was all the more powerful because it was always sought and never obtruded. It will never be known how much the leaders relied upon him in the crises that preceded the appeal to arms or how much they recognized his conservatism, courage, and Americanism.

Blessed are the peacemakers. But it takes rare wisdom to be a peacemaker—rare tact and disinterestedness.

When he fell ill, a shock came to us all, a sense of national calamity. His life had crept into that of the nation! We felt how much we might have to miss him in the reconstruction that follows after war; how much he could do, and how much he could prevent. The nation watched at his bedside, and finally wept by his grave.

The President himself has written his touching epitaph:

In him the nation has lost one of its most illustrious citizens and one of its most faithful servants. His participation in the business life and the lawmaking body of his native State was marked by unswerving fidelity and by a high order of talents and attainments, and his too brief career as Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate exhibited the loftiest qualities of upright and sagacious statesmanship. In the world of affairs he had few equals among his contemporaries. His private character was gentle and noble. He will long be mourned by his friends as a man of singular purity and attractiveness, whose sweetness of disposition won all hearts, while his elevated purposes, his unbending integrity, and wholehearted devotion to the public good deserved and acquired universal respect and esteem.

As an American and from his own State, "I will instruct my sorrows to be proud." He is one who served his country faithfully. He died for that country as truly as any soldier in battle, welcoming the work that killed and meeting death without fear as patriot, statesman, and Christian gentleman, the Nation's servant and the People's friend, leaving a memory that is unstained and that best of monuments, the universal affection of the People for whom he worked.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, it is not certain that the death of any man ought to be spoken of as untimely, because the world in which we live is without meaning or significance of any noble kind if we forget that our times are in the Hand which is upon all things. Yet the death of such a man as GARRET A. HOBART seems to the feeble insight which is granted to us amid the perplexities and mysteries of human affairs like the squandering of an estate or the loss of a priceless treasure.

He died in the midst of his labors and his honors, at the very moment of his largest usefulness in the world. The career of such a man is not an accident. it illustrates not only the opportunities of American life, but the benevolent working of the laws under which the progress of society is made sure. There is a doctrine grown to influence in these days which impeaches the whole framework of society, because it imposes upon all a struggle for existence in which only the fit survive. In order to put an end to such a tragedy, the world is filled with dreams of impossible conditions, in which all shall share alike in the rewards of life. According to the teachings of this school of thought, all who win success under the present condition of things are reckoned enemies of those who fail; and there are men who, in their eagerness to do away with the battlefields of life, are ready to set mankind on a dead level, in which there shall be neither failure nor success, but a perfect calm, in which all may enjoy the luxury of a common repose.

It is a sign of unhealthy times when the social and political philosophy of a race like ours becomes infected with these morbid opinions, for they not only pull down the fabric of society which has been slowly builded through the ages, but make any worthy and progressive human institutions impracticable.

A Senator of the United States, famous in the world of business and politics, in paying tribute to Mr. HOBART'S memory, found an illustration of the probity of his character in the success of his work as arbitrator of the Joint Traffic Association. The orator said that every one of the thirty-seven railway managers concerned had come up from the ranks and had won his way by his own ability. And no one could listen to his words without perceiving in them not only a tribute to GARRET A. HOBART, but a justification of the law of labor, under which the victories of life belong to those who win them.

While the world is larger than it was when GARRET A. HOBART was born, the fear is just as groundless as it was then that the sons of the rich are to drive the sons of the poor out of the race of life. The poor boy is the only boy that has any chance in the world or ever did have. This world will always be governed by the intellectual and moral strength there is in it, and neither the one or the other will ever be possible except under the discipline of hardship and necessity. The hope of mankind to-day lies not in the palaces of luxury and wealth, but in the cottages of the people, about humble family altars, in obscure places where the storms of all skies beat and where the rugged fiber of manhood is made, which is a victor over circumstances, a master of opportunities, a crowned athlete in the games of fortune and achievement.

The ancestors of Mr. HOBART were pioneers in the woods of New Hampshire, so far as the favor of nature is concerned probably the most backward of that marvelous group of communities called New England, which not only nurtured the intellectual life of America, but has sent forth her children to lay the foundations of new commonwealths and bequeathed to them the imperishable riches of the old homestead.

It may be counted fortunate for Mr. HOBART that he did not enter upon the responsibilities of life without an adequate preparation. It may be true, as Thomas Carlyle has said, that "your true university is the collection of books," and that men may obtain knowledge without the advantages of other education, but the number of self-educated men who have reached great eminence, without the patient training of the schools, is not sufficiently large to mislead the youth of our day. The estimate which General Garfield once gave of the influence of the small colleges of the country compared with the great seats of learning is justified by a thousand illustrations, and by none more completely than by the case of the late Vice-President. At Rutgers College, a struggling institution within easy reach of his home, in an atmosphere free from every contagion, surrounded by teachers who entered into the personal life of the student and kindled within him that love of learning which can not be communicated without the touch of sympathy, he found the exact environment adapted to his case.

The fabulous endowments now steadily flowing to the centers of American culture, new and old, are not to be despised, but the youth of America ought to be warned against the temptation never absent in circumstances of ease and extravagance, of degrading the ideals of learning by the parade of material things; and the universities boasting themselves of size without age need to be often reminded of the blasphemy of the imposter in the Acts of the Apostles, who thought to buy the gift of God with money.

It is not to be supposed that Mr. HOBART, graduating at the age of 19, founded his success in life upon what he learned at college, or even upon what he acquired as a school-teacher and student of of law. Yet, it would be hard to overstate the advantages which a young man derives from the training of a college course and the arduous self-discipline of a school-teacher. A good teacher gives much to a school, but the school gives to the teacher even more; so that it is not strange that so many men and women have come from the patient labor of the district schoolroom into the larger service of their day and generation. Mr. HOBART was in some sense a pioneer of the new professional life which in the larger American cities has abolished the old-fashioned attorney and made the new counselor at law a part of the industrial and commercial activity of the community. While he had the faculty of plain and direct speech, he was at no time in his career noted as an advocate, nor did he ever pose as a jurist weighed down with the obsolete lore of the profession.

He had the genius of success. As a student he copied papers and records in the law office which he afterwards owned, and for twenty years he was president of the bank in which he began as a clerk, during the trying period in which he was getting a foothold in the world. He was a man of affairs, who understood the law as applied to modern business with perfect accuracy, and whose opinion on practical questions involved in large enterprises soon came to be counted everywhere as sound.

It has been observed by the older judges that the legal profession as it was known to our fathers has been noticeably influenced to the revolutions of the modern business world. The orator who once captivated juries by his persuasive eloquence is hardly more than a tradition, while the leader of the bar who once overawed the courts by the weight of his personal authority no longer finds an appreciative audience outside of the rural circuit. In their places have come experts in the various fields of business enterprise, shrewd and limited men who have taken the pains to know more about a few things than their predecessors ever had time to find out about everything. In such a professional atmosphere the common man is lost, and sinks to a cipher without vital relation to the world at large of any sort, while the profession itself runs the risk of becoming a mere case-grinding drudgery in which the larger faculties of the mind perish altogether.

Mr. HOBART lived through the perils which beset the corporation lawyer of our times, rising year by year into a broader intellectual horizon; and when the American people called him to the second office in their gift, he was able to lock up his law office at Paterson, close the business engagements of a lifetime, and become the trusted counselor of all with whom he was associated in the Government of the United States. By his singular foresight he became a man of wealth, yet in his whole career no man ever suspected his integrity or disparaged his prosperity. He had the respect of poor and rich alike, and in the city where he lived his name inspired the confidence and affection of all. He gained his wealth in a manly, honest way, and used it while he lived to help and bless the world. Few men have ever exhibited a more symmetrical life than his.

The thing that struck me most forcibly about him when I first knew him nearly twenty years ago was the fact that though his time was pressed upon by a variety of engagements so innumerable as to encumber and bewilder any but an extraordinary man, yet in the midst of all the cares of business he had time for politics, local and national; time for his church, time for his friends, and time for the fireside, from which he drew the gentlest inspirations of his laborious life.

My acquaintance with Mr. HOBART began in the summer of 1884, when, as an inexperienced campaign speaker, I saw much of him at the national headquarters of the committee which managed Mr. Blaine's Presidential canvass. He was one of the extraordinary group of young men who were drawn about the person of Mr. Blaine by those remarkable qualities which made him so long the leader of his party, and I speak here to-day on this mournful occasion because in those years I found in Mr. HOBART a friend whose counsel was always unselfish and whose hand was ever ready in acts of kindness and good will. In three Presidential campaigns I knew him as a political manager charged with the success of the party to which he was devoted. I saw him day and night in the work of the campaign, and while I have seen the storm of clamor and detraction gather about the heads of those who were associated with him in this party service, the fact that GARRET A. HOBART shared in every responsibility of his associates has always enabled me to feel that the working field of American politics, instead of being a corrupt and corrupting thing, is a high arena in which men of character may serve their countrymen without dishonor or reproach.

Surprise has been expressed by some that this plain man, whose name was comparatively obscure until his party selected him as its candidate for the Vice-Presidency, should have been able to so exalt that office as to bring back the prestige which it bore in the earlier days of the Republic. To those who knew Mr. HOBART well there is nothing strange in the fact that his brief service in the chair of the Senate dignified that public station with a new and high distinction. Few men knew more about American politics or had studied the public service of the United States to a better purpose than he. From the day he opened his law office in Paterson he was profoundly interested, both in theory and in practice, in the politics of his town, his county, his State, and his country.

Mr. HOBART was a great Vice-President; first, because he became easily the master of the duties of that office; and then, so large and generous was the man himself that he brought to the office a personality which attracted at once the consideration of the whole Senate and the whole country. No man ever met him without receiving from him a word of helpfulness and good cheer, and no man ever entered his door without breathing at once the air of a perfect hospitality. His judgment was unerring upon questions involving public or party policy, and the man himself was too great to use a minute of his time in spiteful disparagement of other men.

It has been observed as worthy at least of note that the late Vice-President, while he lived, was an adviser and intimate friend of the President, helping him to bear his burdens and giving him with an unselfish motive continual help and guidance in the midst of difficult affairs. It has been said that no such relation between the two offices was ever known before, and that with no exception our American Vice-Presidents, though many of them were strong and famous, have spent their influence in undermining the Administration of the President or in stupid lamentations over their own neglected and unimportant lot.

If Mr. HOBART was loyal to the President it was not, as some have thought, because he was conscious of any disqualification in himself that would make his own aspirations to the Presidency out of place. It was partly at least because, knowing by experience more probably than anybody else about the nomination of Presidents and the election of them, he had acquired the wisdom to know that men are not lifted up in the estimation of the world by trying to drag others down; and that the forces which make Presidents of the United States out of men operate on too large a scale to be seriously affected by the gossip of the dinner table or the whispers of the cloakroom.

Therefore, with a sane mind, grateful to his countrymen for the honor they had given him, he set himself to deliver the office of Vice-President from the cheap and petulant influences that have always surrounded it. How well he succeeded all men know, and it is not too much to say that had he lived he would have drawn to himself such a measure of popular enthusiasm that his countrymen would have invited him to step from the second chariot into the first. Already his name was spoken with honor in every section of the country. On the day he died, in traveling over the prairies west of the Missouri, I saw upon every schoolhouse the flag at half-mast, and at every railway station groups of people talking in subdued voices of the death of Vice-President HOBART; and wherever the flag of the United States is known, even in the ends of the earth, it became the sign of the universal affliction of his countrymen. We come here to-day to add our tribute to his memory. We can not hope by what we say in the least to repair the loss which the nation has sustained in his death. We may not even presume with our faltering words of eulogy to console the broken hearts which have so recently followed him to the grave; we can only commend them to God and the Word of His grace.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, GARRET AUGUSTUS HOBART, Vice-President of the United States, died at half past 8 o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, November 21, 1899, at his home in the city of Paterson, N. J. His death was not unexpected, for Mr. HOBART had made a strong battle for life before the summons came. All that medical science and the encouragement of friends could do was exerted in his behalf, but he had to succumb finally to the hand of death.

Few men in the history of this country have grown into such great prominence as Mr. HOBART from the time he became Vice-President of the United States until the day of his death. It was an unusual spectacle to behold, contrasted with the past, a Vice-President of these United States who was close in touch with the molding of the policy of his party, being accorded that consideration in the councils of the nation which has seldom been accorded to one occupying the position he did. It can not be said that this recognition grew out of any prominence he had attained in public life or from any great attainments that he was himself master of; nor can it be said that it was due to any transcendent position he occupied in his chosen profession; but it can be truthfully asserted that it was due to the strong personal character that admitted of his grasping situations with celerity and a power of discrimination in his judgment of men and measures which come to those who by perseverance and aggressiveness have been able to surmount obstacles and throw down barriers in order to accomplish the object sought.

Born in comparative obscurity, he possessed to a remarkable degree the energy and determination which have proved the mainspring of success in the lives of all successful men.

He was born in historic Monmouth County, in the month of June, 1844. Monmouth, whose fields were consecrated to American liberty by the blood of patriots at old Monmouth Court-House, nigh unto the very soil that was trodden by such heroes as Washington, Wayne, Lafayette, Knox, Green, Steuben, and a host of others; near where Washington and Lafayette, wrapped in a single cloak, lay down to rest the night before the battle of Monmouth Court-House, and near where the brave Mollie Pitcher became famous and went down into history as the "woman cannoneer of Monmouth." With these environments it is little to be wondered at that the late Vice-President, no doubt inspired by his patriotic surroundings, was urged onward to achieve glory in civil life, which finally ended in his becoming the second citizen of this great Republic.

Like the majority of the great men of this nation, his early education was obtained in our country's greatest institution—its common schools. He finished his education at old Rutgers College, graduating in the year 1863, and, as I understand it, soon entered upon the duties of a schoolmaster, finally taking up the study of law and entering the ranks of that profession, no doubt, when he started out, intending to reach a position that might place him with some of the great legal lights that have made New Jersey famous.

He was not long destined to remain in the ranks of the struggling attorney. This was not due to lack of education or legal attainments, but to the fact that he found other pursuits more congenial, and he directed his attention to some of the great industrial interests of New Jersey. His legal ability must have been of a superior order, for we find that early in his professional career (1871) he became counsel to the manufacturing city of Paterson, and a year later counsel to the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Passaic. The appointment to these positions indicate that young HOBART was possessed of superior legal ability, for in the exercise of his duties he was compelled to pass upon grave constitutional and municipal questions, and no one could occupy either position unless a sure and safe legal education had been acquired.

About this time—1872—he entered the field of politics by being elected a member of the house of assembly for the city of Paterson. He was reelected in 1873, and in the year 1874 his rank was such in his party that they honored him with the position of speaker. He entered the senate of the State in 1876 and served in that body six years, twice occupying the distinguished position of president of the senate. During all this time he kept growing in the confidence of the people, and his ability was such that he ranked as one of the leaders of the Republican party in the State, and during this period, either in the house of assembly or in the senate, he was associated with and had for his colleagues some of New Jersey's most eminent citizens.

At one time or another there sat with him the distinguished and learned Chancellor Magill, Chief Justice Magee, of the supreme court of the State, ex-Governor George C. Ludlow, the senior Senator from New Jersey, WILLIAM J. SEWELL, and my colleague, Mr. GARDNER, of the First Congressional district of the State. Some of these that I have named were then but young men; some of them had not reached middle life, but they have since arisen preeminent in my State and in the nation, and do you wonder that with these surroundings the lamented Vice-President paved the way to ascend the ladder of fame? His very contact with these men must have further excited his ambition as they moved along side by side in life's struggle.

After he left the senate of New Jersey the bent of his energies was directed in the channel of business enterprise, and I am informed that at the time of his death he was interested to the extent of being director in more than sixty companies, banking and business interests. He became general manager of the East Jersey Water Company, and was president of the Passaic Water Company, the Paterson Railroad Company, and the People's Gas Company. He was director in the First National and other banks of Paterson and elsewhere; was director of the New York, Susquehanna and Western Railroad, the Lehigh and Hudson Valley Railroad, Barbour Brothers Company, Barbour Flax Spinning Company, the Edison Electric Illuminating Company, and many other large institutions. His connection with these great concerns demonstrated his great financial and business ability, for from struggling corporations he built some of them up, by his perseverance and the exercise of wisdom and discretion, to be the greatest industries of our State, and through his connection with these institutions he laid the foundation for the building up of the great fortune he left behind.

With all these interests absorbing his time and energies, you would imagine he would lose sight of the people; that he would lose sight of the governmental interests and policies of State and nation; but, nevertheless, he kept in close touch with his party and his party's leaders and the country. Ever genial, ever kind, possessed of a strong magnetism, his party and people sought his advice and counsel, and he maintained that hold upon them that even while occupied with business interests he guided the policy of his party in his State and guided its policy in the nation. The power that he possessed in the great interests of his State would have made some men arrogant, overbearing, and selfish; but never once have I known it to be said of him that his political or his business preferment ever made him lose sight of the fact that he was plain GARRET A. HOBART. He possessed all the attributes of a leader. He was conciliatory, yet brave; extremely partisan, but generous to a political opponent. His presiding over the Senate and his ever-courteous bearing toward all parties demonstrated his strength of character, for public history has recorded the fact that the stronger the partisan and the greater the leader the less arbitrary his conduct when called upon to exercise discretion in trying situations. Of course there are exceptions to this rule, but in the main this principle will apply.

I knew Mr. HOBART well. As a member of the senate of the State of New Jersey I frequently came in contact with him at the statehouse and had many opportunities to judge of his character. I do not wonder that when he came to Washington he made the same impression upon those he came in contact with that he did in his own State. Those who knew him well loved him; those who knew him not so well admired him.

The tribute paid Mr. HOBART by his colleagues in the Senate speaks eloquently and forcibly of his fairness in presiding over the deliberations of that body. Grave public questions were involved during his occupancy of the chair as presiding officer and it has yet to be said that he ever exercised any arbitrary power or discriminated in favor of one or the other, but treated all alike.

I have never heard Mr. HOBART criticised save for being a partisan; but, Mr. Speaker, to my mind that was a tribute, for when a man enters public life he does it through the channels of some political party to which he has become devoted, and if, forsooth, his party err on some given proposition, yet for the good his party has done he remains true, relying upon the conservative element to correct the error when the proper time comes, and not rise and strike it down that upon its ruins might be erected and perpetuated another. Such a partisan was Mr. HOBART, and such political characters live in the hearts of men when party destroyers have passed into oblivion.

Mr. HOBART'S strict attention to public business, his attention to his private interests, and that genial disposition of his nature which led him to attend to the calls that society made upon him soon undermined the vigorous constitution of which he was possessed, so that on the 4th of March, 1899, he with the President and Senator HANNA took themselves to the quiet retreat of Thomasville, Ga., there to recuperate and build up his physical and nervous condition. It was there that he was first taken seriously ill, and he soon returned to Washington. As his sickness progressed he longed for his home by the sea at Long Branch, to be near the scenes of his earliest childhood in the county of his nativity, hoping that the ocean's breezes might benefit him and the dreary monotony be relieved by gazing upon the scenes of pleasure of that locality. But relief came not, and I have no doubt as he looked on the waves breaking their force upon the shores and calmly receding the thought of the poet was suggested:

Faded wave, joy to thee;
Now thy flight and toil are over;
Oh, may my departure be
Calm as thine, thou ocean rover.

When this sad soul's last joy on earth
On the shore of time is driven,
Be its lot like thine on earth,
To be lost away in heaven.

He practically spent the entire summer at Long Branch, save for a short trip to Lake Champlain, where he went to join the President. In the early fall he returned to his home in Paterson, and there lingered, battling with disease, until the date I have mentioned, when he departed this life.

No tribute that tongue can pay can be as grand as the tribute paid by the people of his adopted city as he lay in death in Carroll Hall. Public business was suspended, great manufacturing interests closed that thousands in that busy city might join in the manifestations of sorrow that pervaded our entire country. What a scene was that, Mr. Speaker, when the rich and the poor and the great men of our nation were bending their heads in sorrow in the streets of that city, all alike feeling the loss of a great public servant and benefactor. The personality of the man was alike to all; the same sunny smile was for the rich as the poor, and the same cordial greeting was bestowed upon everyone he came in contact with. His generous liberality was appreciated by everyone.

I wish that I had the eloquence to pay that tribute his memory deserves. By those who knew him he will be fondly spoken of until the last survivor has passed away, and when history shall write him, he shall live as one who loved his country, who loved its institutions and its people. I can not better summarize than to say he lived a true life, and in the language of the great philanthropist, Horace Greeley, who said, "Whoever seeks to know if his career has been prosperous and brightening from its outset to its close should ask not for broad acres or towering edifices or laden coffers; ask rather, Did he live a true life?"

GARRET HOBART lived a true life, and as he lived a true life, so much greater shall be his reward in the hereafter. In a quiet spot in Cedar Lawn Cemetery reposes all that of him was mortal, there to rest until called forth on the resurrection morning to enjoy eternal happiness in the presence of his Redeemer.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, GARRET A. HOBART still lives, both yonder and here. His soul nourished the hope of immortality, and his life here was so consonant with that hope that his life there will be but an exalted, beautified, and glorified realization of his ideals.

He was a typical man; typical because he illustrated in an almost matchless degree the best of our civilization. During all the ages, in art and architecture, in poetry and philosophy, those only have left permanent influences for the welfare of the human race and have moved the standards of right living onward and upward who typified those ideals that will forever mark their times. GARRET A. HOBART was the highest type of the American citizen of his day.

In this eager age of wealth gathering, over against the hot haste, in bold relief, stands every virtue; and he who in the midst of the mad rush illustrates those virtues truly typifies all that is best of his time. You will search in vain the long list of noble lives ending with the century for a life that more completely and beautifully exemplifies and symbolizes the essential virtues of our civilization than that of HOBART.

Born upon a farm, he started life at the lowest round of the ladder of human endeavor, but never missed a step in its ascent, as the farm boy, the district-school lad, the college student, the teacher, the lawyer, the State representative, the man of stupendous business affairs, the ideal Vice-President of the United States.

Is honesty for its own sake one of the essentials of American manhood? GARRET A. HOBART stood for all that that word can suggest; he could not even think dishonestly. He was a stranger to indirection. His plans were great, but as open as the sunlight. His honor was the "finest sense of justice the human mind can frame." He was too broad and generous to cavil over technicalities; with him implication was as binding as his bond. Intent, not forms of words, determined his action.

Are the boundless burdens of our highly organized society to be voluntarily assumed by every true friend of mankind? This was his belief, for he gave his great heart of sympathy and generous hand to every good work.

If the influence of loyalty to principle and fidelity to duty be sought in its highest development, we need seek no other illustration than his life.

No man had a profounder and sweeter sympathy or enjoyed more the fragrance of a friend's heart. His was a friendship which, once pledged, never swerved; weighed well before it trusted, but did not weigh before it served.

Very recently a lifelong companion remarked that if HOBART happened by any chance to learn that a friend wanted something, he would straightway try to obtain it for him. When the shadows of life were thickening, and he knew well that the sun would shine through them no more, he expressed an earnest wish that he might do a kindness for one, who, he said, had been true to him.

His was a truly noble life; simple, yet exalted. He made his character by being what he desired to seem.

What essential quality or virtue did he not possess? He was instinctively intelligent and profoundly just. He possessed great talents, and his tact was boundless. His judgment was almost unerring and his generosity limitless. His patriotism was calm and unswerving. He was the very soul of honor. He harbored no bitter hatreds; he nursed no relentless animosities. His friendship was a devotion. His character was as pure and spotless as a star.

His was a life of sunshine, and it cast no shadows. What circumstance, what incident, what event, what endeavor, what achievement, what private obligation, what public duty, what institution, what personal relationship, what human life was not more fortunate because the soul of GARRET A. HOBART had touched it? And so he still speaks in ten thousand sweet influences that can know no ending; and the world will forever be the better because he once lived in it.

His name, reaching down the age of time,
Will still through the age of eternity shine
Like a star, sailing on through the depths of the blue,
On whose brightness we gaze every evening anew.

[Mr. SALMON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen who desired to contribute something on this occasion having been unavoidably compelled to be absent, I ask unanimous consent for general leave to print.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks for general leave to print upon the life and character of the late

Vice-President of the United States, Mr. GARRET A. HOBART. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MILITARY HOSPITAL, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 6.

The Clerk read, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use $100,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. CURTIS. After the estimates were sent in last year the War Department made a special estimate of $100,000 for the construction of a hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

The following is the special estimate:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1899

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, of the 28th ultimo, submitting an estimate of appropriation ($100,000) for the erection of a modern hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Respectfully, yours,
O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 28, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for transmission to Congress, an estimate ($100,000) of appropriation for "Hospital construction," for the erection of a modern hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Very respectfully,
R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, by the Surgeon-General United States Army.

Hospital construction:

For the erection of a modern hospital, for 100 beds, of stone and brick, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., including heating, ventilating, plumbing, wiring for electric lights, gas piping, elevator, dynamo, electric motor, bookcases, lockers, closets, mortuary, ambulance shelter, stable, etc. (Submitted) $100,000

NOTE.—In explanation of the foregoing estimate the following communication of Maj. George H. Torney, United States Army, surgeon in charge of the post hospital at Fort Leavenworth, transmitted to the War Department through military channels, is respectfully submitted:

UNITED STATES ARMY POST HOSPITAL,
Fort Leavenworth, Kans., November 27, 1898.

SIR: I have respectfully to report that the post hospital now in use at this post is inadequate and of insufficient capacity for the requirements of the sick of this command.

It is what is known as a 24-bed army hospital, which at this moment contains 60 patients. In order to provide space for beds for the additional patients, the storerooms and rooms heretofore used for administrative purposes are being utilized, under many disadvantages.

The dining room and kitchen are, of course, too small for the use of the convalescent sick and the men of the hospital corps, rendering it necessary to serve two separate sittings for each of the three daily meals to seat all the men for whom provision must be made.

When this hospital was constructed, it was intended to provide for the sick of a command numbering between 300 and 400 men. The command now numbers nearly 900 men, and will reach over 1,200 when the regiment is recruited to its full capacity. Its inadequacy is therefore apparent.

At this time it is in need of extensive repairs in the way of repainting, reflooring, entire change in the plumbing arrangements, involving a large increase in the closet accommodation (there being now only one water-closet for each ward), change in the ventilation, etc., which will involve a large outlay in money without increasing the capacity of the building for the care of the sick.

In view of these facts, and the prospective increase of the number of men in this garrison, of the reestablishment of the school of instruction, and of the designation of this post as a place of rendezvous for troops returning from the Tropics for recuperation of the health of the men who have been serving in Cuba and Puerto Rico, I have urgently to recommend that application be made for funds for the construction at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., of a modern brick hospital of 100 beds.

A building of this kind and size will, according to recent estimates and experience, cost about $1,000 per bed, making a total outlay of $100,000 for a new hospital of sufficient capacity to meet the requirements of a garrison of 1,800 men.

It is, however, essential that this question should receive early consideration, as the present hospital can not be enlarged to meet the demands that will be made upon it for the care of the sick admitted to it from an increased garrison and from other posts.

Very respectfully,

GEO. H. TORNEY,
Major and Surgeon, U. S. A., Surgeon in Charge.

The ADJUTANT, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

A hearing was had before the committee, and the original estimate was increased the sum of $100,000 in order that the money might be used for that purpose. It was distinctly understood that the money, or so much thereof as might be necessary, was to be expended to build a hospital at Fort Leavenworth. But the committee desired not to specifically name the place. This appropriation, however, of $100,000 was made. The money was set aside at the War Department. But upon investigation it was found that without the place being specifically named in the bill the Department was limited to an expenditure of $20,000. So the appropriation was not used. Plans and specifications, however, were drawn, and the Surgeon-General has held the money and desires to use it for the purpose for which it was appropriated. His letters on this subject appear in the report of the committee.

I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] that this resolution was drawn at the Department. The money is already appropriated. The resolution makes no extra appropriation. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TALBERT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this resolution has been considered by the appropriate committee?

Mr. CURTIS. As I have just said, it was unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. There was a hearing before the full committee—an open meeting. I have the report here, which embodies two letters from the Surgeon-General.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Let it be read.

The report of the Committee on Military Affairs (by Mr. HULL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use $100,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., having had the same under consideration, report back to the House, recommending that said resolution do pass, with the following amendments:

Strike out the word "Treasury" where it appears in the title of the resolution and in line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the word "War."

Letters of the Surgeon-General United States Army bearing on the subject of this resolution are herewith submitted and made a part of this report.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 20, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. CURTIS: Your letter of March 18 has just reached me. I fully understood that a portion of the appropriation made by Congress was to be used for the erection of a hospital at Fort Leavenworth, and it is my intention to build at that place a first-class modern hospital of proper capacity for the needs of the post. But it did not occur to me at the time I promised you and when I was before the committee that I had not authority to expend a sufficient sum for building such a hospital as we need at Fort Leavenworth. I had forgotten that I am restricted to an expenditure of $20,000 by some previous legislation—that is, no hospital can be constructed at an expense exceeding $20,000 without first obtaining specific authority from Congress. What I propose to do now is to have the plans drawn for such a hospital as is needed at Fort Leavenworth, and to ask for the necessary authority, when Congress meets again in the autumn, to expend so much of the appropriation already made as may be necessary to build a hospital at Fort Leavenworth. The appropriation already made will be available as soon as I get this authority, and as no additional appropriation will be asked for there should be no difficulty in obtaining the necessary legislation. Contracts can then be made and the work commenced in the spring of 1900.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. M. STERNBERG,
Surgeon-General United States Army.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS, M. C.,
Topeka, Kans.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, November 27, 1899.

DEAR SIR: The appropriation for the construction and repair of hospitals for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, was increased by $100,000 for the purpose of constructing a modern post hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., but owing to the fact that under existing laws not more than $20,000 of this appropriation can be used for any one building unless specially authorized by act of Congress, I have been unable to call for bids for the construction of this hospital. In order that the money may be available, I transmit herewith a draft of a joint resolution, with request that it may be introduced at an early date. In my opinion the amount mentioned will not be necessary, and it is probable that an entirely satisfactory post hospital of fifty beds can be erected for $60,000. Any balance of the appropriation which may remain will of course be available for use elsewhere.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. M. STERNBERG,
Surgeon-General United States Army.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this increases the expense in any way?

Mr. CURTIS. It does not increase the appropriation at all. It simply authorizes the use of money heretofore appropriated for the purpose for which it was appropriated.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. This is an appropriation which has already been made?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; made upon the recommendation of the Department.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I understand that this proposes to divert an appropriation already made and which under existing law can not be used for the purpose proposed.

Mr. CURTIS. The appropriation was made for the purpose of erecting a hospital; but at that time neither the committee nor the Surgeon-General bore in mind the fact that $20,000 was the limit. Therefore the name of this specific hospital was not inserted, although the estimate was made for Fort Leavenworth. The hearing before the committee was on the subject of Fort Leavenworth; it was so published in the report. But the name was left out in the bill, though the understanding of both the Department and the committee was that the money was to be used at Fort Leavenworth. There is no place in the country where a new hospital is so much needed as at Fort Leavenworth.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It seems to me that this is a matter which properly comes within the jurisdiction of another committee. Having that view, while I do not desire to object at this time, I ask the gentleman to let this matter stand over until Monday, so that it may receive further examination.

Mr. CURTIS. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Before the matter goes over, allow me to ask why was $100,000 necessary for the erection of this hospital at Fort Leavenworth, whereas under the general law the limit of expense in such cases is $20,000?

Mr. CURTIS. They desire to erect a hospital larger than is usually erected. A hospital with 50 beds will cost about $60,000. On account of the size of the fort the number of invalids at Fort Leavenworth is larger, and hence a larger building was deemed necessary.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. It was thought necessary to have a larger hospital at that place than anywhere else in the country?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no; there are larger hospitals in other parts of the country, but in such cases the hospital was specifically named in the appropriation. In this case that was not done.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. So you want to abrogate, so far as Fort Leavenworth is concerned, the general law providing the limit of $20,000?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; because this place was named in the estimate and $100,000 was asked for.

Mr. COX. Has there been a report in this case from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; the resolution is unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. COX. When was that report made?

Mr. CURTIS. A week or ten days ago. I appeared before the committee.

Mr. COX. Oh, I have no doubt the gentleman appeared there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the report was made January 16.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Kansas withdraws this?

Mr. CURTIS. With the understanding that it will come up Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. It is withdrawn for the present?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then the matter is not before the House. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas that unanimous consent will have to be given before it can occupy the position of unfinished business.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that it may be called up after the reading of the Journal on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think we had better let it go over and let the gentleman have recognition to ask again for its consideration. That is the better course.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4602. An act to authorize the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Reno and Fort Sill military reservations in the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy, at West Point, Olmedo Alfaro, of Ecuador.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SETTLE.

Mr. GAYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the order heretofore made setting apart February 10 next for eulogies on my predecessor, the late Representative SETTLE, of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to withdraw for the time being the special order for the eulogies upon the death of the late Mr. SETTLE, of Kentucky, heretofore fixed for February 10. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BAIRD.

The SPEAKER. As there is no further business this morning for the consideration of the House, and as 1 o'clock is set for the memorial exercises on the death of the late SAMUEL T. BAIRD, of Louisiana, the Chair, if there is no objection, will call up that matter now for the consideration of the House.

Tnere was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk and move their adoption.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. SAMUEL T. BAIRD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for fitting tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, do adjourn.

The SPEAKER. In the form in which these resolutions are drawn it is proper that they should be submitted now.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Speaker, one of the most appropriate customs of this House is that of paying grateful tribute to the memory of departed members. We live in the most rapid and progressive age the world has ever seen. There is great progress in every line of human endeavor, in every art and science, in every phase of life—social or political, public or private—and we Americans are the most advanced people of this age; but, thank God, the march of progress has not dulled the feelings of our hearts, and we are ready to pause and mourn for a deceased brother as was our blessed Lord two thousand years ago when he wept over the body of his beloved Lazarus. Indeed, I believe that the world is growing better in this respect and that we love and honor our dead more now than at any other period of history. This may be due to our superior educational advancement, but I think it flows rather from a clearer conception of the truths of religion. Be that as it may, this beautiful custom has become firmly fixed in Congress, and no matter how important our duties may be, we deem it a sad pleasure to turn from them and from the rush of busy life in order to weave memorial chaplets over the graves of our departed brothers.

Among those who have gone from us into the valley of the shadow, into a bright and, I hope, more glorious beyond, is SAMUEL T. BAIRD, of Louisiana, who died at the Riggs Hotel, in this city, on the 22d of April last, and as his successor on the floor of this House it is my sad duty to speak to you of him. This task can better be filled, Mr. Speaker, by his associates here, who knew him so much better than I, but I can not let this opportunity pass without saying a few words to help keep his memory green.

SAMUEL T. BAIRD was born in Morehouse Parish, La., on May 5, 1861, and had he lived thirteen days longer, would have been 38 at the time of his death.

He was educated at home and at Vincennes, Ind. In 1879 he began the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1882, when barely 21 years of age. So successful and promising was he in his profession that in April, 1884, he was elected to the lucrative and responsible position of district attorney of his judicial district, a position which he filled with great credit and honor to himself and people for four years. The young barrister was a favorite of fortune. On the expiration of his term as district attorney he was elected judge of the Sixth judicial district of Louisiana, a position eagerly sought for by the oldest and best attorneys of the district. He presided for four years as sole judge of one of the highest courts of original jurisdiction in the State, and his bearing on the bench was dignified, affable, and courteous. He enjoyed at the time the distinction of being the youngest judge in Louisiana, but, though young in years, his decisions evinced a mature, well-trained mind and gave eminent satisfaction to the bar and to the people.

At the end of his term he resumed the active practice of his profession, but his people had tested his ability and would not let him remain long in private life. In April, 1896, he was elected a member of the Louisiana State senate. In that body he served with distinction on three important committees, and was chairman of the joint Democratic caucus during that session of the general assembly. As one of the delegates from Louisiana to the Chicago convention in 1896 he aided in the nomination of Mr. Bryan for President, and was an enthusiastic supporter of the brilliant Nebraskan. He was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress without much opposition, and was reelected to the Fifty-sixth as the unanimous choice of the Democrats of his district. Few men of his age can point to so brilliant a record and such continued political success. His public career began at 23, and when he died, in his thirty-eighth year, he had given to his people faithful and efficient service as district attorney, judge, State senator, and Congressman. Surely a bright career lay before him if the past be any criterion for the future, for he was not the man to tarry or lag in the march of fame. It is said that "death loves a shining mark," and it certainly found one when SAM BAIRD was called to meet his God.

In the closing days of the Fifty-fifth Congress he contracted violent rheumatism during the terribly cold weather of last February. His splendid constitution bore up against it for a while, but the insidious disease gradually sapped his strength. To add to his difficulties, his youngest child, a lovely boy, was stricken with meningitis and lay for weeks at death's door. He was passionately fond of his son, and the constant watching at his bedside, with its attendant anxiety and worry, made serious inroads on his enfeebled condition. His devoted wife and loving brother, aided by kind friends, ministered faithfully to him, and medical science did its utmost, but the grim destroyer had marked him as her own. On the 22d of April last, in the full vigor of a magnificent manhood—physical and intellectual—he bade his loved ones good-bye and departed on a long journey to that land from whose bourn no traveler returns. Death is always sad, but when an old man is called whose feeble steps and whitened hair indicate that the sands of life are nearly run, we easily reconcile ourselves to the loss. Not so, however, when one dies whose keen eye, elastic step, ruddy cheeks, and glossy hair tell us that youth is in his veins and that the world, with all its joys, its hopes, its ambitions, lies before him.

Previous to BAIRD's last illness there was no finer specimen of physical manhood in this House. Tall, erect, well proportioned, a fine eye and pleasant expression, he was indeed strikingly handsome. Prior to that sickness he had enjoyed nearly perfect health, and dying as he did at the post of duty, from a disease contracted while on duty, it may truly be said of him that he died in the cause of his country. When a soldier falls while fighting in battle, his grateful countrymen sing pæans of praise to him and provide generously for the widow and orphans left behind him. In my humble opinion the soldier who dies in camp from sickness due to exposure is as much entitled to remembrance as he who is stricken by the bullet of the enemy; and what was our deceased friend but a soldier doing camp duty for his people and dying from exposure at his post? Let us accord to his memory the same grateful honor we render to our dead heroes of battle.

I first met SAM BAIRD in Lake Providence in the fall of 1883, when he was quite a young man. I remember well what a handsome fellow he was at that time, and how genial and pleasant to everyone. With the girls he was a special favorite, but that did not seem to make the boys jealous, and no young man in north Louisiana was more universally popular than he. After that I saw little of him, as our homes were some distance apart, but from time to time I met him and watched his brilliant career with much interest. He had a wonderful faculty for making friends, and few came in contact with him without being drawn to him by that indefinable something which attracts and binds all who come within its reach. I have heard many of the brightest men of his acquaintance say that they actually loved SAM BAIRD, and I know of no greater praise than that, for love is the most precious of all earthly treasures, and he who can beget love among many must indeed be a true man. Such a man was our deceased brother, and I believe that all of you who knew him well will attest the truth of this statement. I do not think anyone well acquainted with him, whatever his feelings may have been, will take issue with me when I apply to him the lines of the great poet:

> His years but young, but his experience old;
> His head unmellow'd, but his judgment ripe;
> And, in a word (for far behind his worth
> Come all the praises that I now bestow),
> He was complete in feature and in mind,
> With all good grace to grace a gentleman.

It is sad for such a one to be taken when scarcely in the full vigor of his manhood, with his capacity for enjoyment undiminished, his appetites unsatisfied, and his ambitions unfulfilled. Truly death is a careless reaper who cuts down the ripe and the unripe grain alike. It is wrong to murmur at that Providence whose dispositions are inscrutable and whose ways past finding out, but when such a man as BAIRD is taken from us in his vigorous youth, it requires all our philosophy and religion to submit with resignation. Let us try not murmur, however, for we know not the secrets of the Master, who, though His decree seems hard, doeth all things best.

Ah, why should bitter tears be shed
In sorrow o'er the mounded sod,
When verily there are no dead
Of all the children of our God?

They who are lost to outward sense
Have but flung off their robes of clay,
And, clothed in heavenly radiance,
Attend us on our lonely way.

While sorrow's tears our eyes have wet,
Shed o'er the consecrated dust,
Too much our darkened souls forget
The lessons of enduring trust.

Let living faith serenely pour
Her sunlight on our pathway dim,
And death can have no terrors more,
But holy joy shall walk with him.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with the member in whose honor these observances are held, if measured by time limitations, was very brief; yet he was such an one that when with his genial smile he bade you good morning you felt you had known him for a lifetime; and although my time acquaintance with him was short and my personal association with him was meager, I do not feel that I am offering the tribute of a stranger, but of a personal friend.

I was one of that sad company that journeyed on the funeral train from the capital of the nation to his Southern home. It was my first visit to the Southland at this season of the year, the season when my Northern home was yet locked in the icy embrace of winter. And to see the luxuriant foliage, green grasses, and blooming flowers, to see the people arrayed in summer habiliments and carrying umbrellas to protect themselves from the rays of the sun, at a time when Minnesota was in midwinter, impressed me deeply. But the fact that made the most indelible impression on my mind was that the people there assembled—and it seemed to me that the whole countryside had turned out—were animated by a common purpose, and this purpose did not appear to be so much in honor of his achievements, though on every side these achievements were spoken of with pride; not so much a feeling of respect, although the high respect in which he was held was everywhere manifest, as it was a spirit of personal bereavement, such as one feels when he stands at the bier of a dear relative.

Men clad in broadcloth cut by the fashionable tailor sat beside the farmer and laborer arrayed in their Sunday best that bore the unmistakable marks of the "ready-made" clothing store, and mingled their tears together. Women draped in rustling silks and women clad in gingham and calico gowns sat in the same pew and sobbed in common sympathy. It seemed to me he was a brother to them all, and the infallible sign of this brotherly affection in which he was held was everywhere in evidence. What is this infallible sign? When a man achieves distinguished success in public life and when honor and respect are the predominant features of the regard in which he is held, he is known and addressed by the title of his office, as Congressman A, Governor B, or Senator C. When honor and respect exist in a lesser degree they know him and call him by the cold, hollow, society-created title of Mr. But when they love him for winning qualities of mind and soul they discard all official titles, all society-created addresses, and know him and address him and speak of him by the name whispered by loving lips when the man of God sprinkled the emblematic waters of baptism on his brow.

Go out in the Commonwealth of Illinois, to the early home and among the early associates of the greatest President of modern times, and he is never spoken of as President Lincoln, but always as "Abe" Lincoln.

Go to my own State, go into the home of the millionaire or the log cabin of the frontiersman, and you will never hear our junior Senator referred to as Congressman NELSON, Governor NELSON, or Senator NELSON. He is KNUTE NELSON. Go with me to a certain Congressional district in the Hawkeye State—a Congressional district that has as much reason to be proud of and is as proud of their brilliant Representative as any Congressional district in the United States. Traverse the length of it as I did last midsummer, you will hear no one speak of General HENDERSON, Congressman HENDERSON, or Speaker HENDERSON; but the name "DAVE" HENDERSON is in everyone's mouth. And in that sorrowing multitude gathered under Louisiana's sunny skies, I heard no one mention Congressman BAIRD, but in hushed whispers it was passed among the throng, "SAM" BAIRD is dead.

The humble home, its plain furnishings, the modest surroundings denoted the fact that he was possessed of but moderate competence, but the lingering affection with which the name "SAM" BAIRD was whispered proclaimed the fact that in the bank of love and friendship—the only financial institution whose drafts are honored in the realm beyond the grave—he had an unlimited deposit.

When a promising public man passes away in the morning of his life, his constituency, the State, and the nation feel and appreciate the loss. But I sometimes think it is a gain for the individual. SAMUEL T. BAIRD lived long enough to demonstrate that the possibilities in his public career were almost limitless, but he did not live long enough to experience the envyings, the jealousies, the heart-burnings that always accompany great public successes.

It is a theory among some that a man's feature, form, and manner proclaim in unmistakable terms his character—form an open book that all men can read. I believe this, and the first time SAMUEL T. BAIRD walked into this Hall his commanding figure attracted my attention, and it was a figure to command attention in any throng. Its athletic mold bespoke strength and power; the clear eye, courage; the bright and winning smile, kindliness of heart; his springing and elastic step, buoyancy and hope—face, form, and feature proclaimed him what he was, the ideal Southern gentleman; an "ideal Southern gentleman," and this phrase itself exhausts eulogy.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker—

To every man upon this earth
Death cometh soon or late.

But to the members of this Congress it has come with unusual frequency. Day after day we have met in this Hall to pay our tributes of respect to those who but a few months ago were occupying their accustomed places here, but whose forms and faces we shall see no more upon earth.

The grim reaper, Death, has indeed gathered a rich harvest for the tomb from the members of the Fifty-sixth Congress—the distinguished gentleman from Maine, Mr. Dingley, the acknowledged leader of his party in the House, ripe in years and experience; the faithful and devoted tribunal of the people from Missouri, Mr. Bland; the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Greene; the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Danford; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Ermentrout; the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Settle, and the young and talented Representative from the State of Louisiana, SAMUEL T. BAIRD.

Truly are we warned of the certainty of death and of the uncertainty of life by the frequency with which death has invaded this House. It has spared neither the young nor the old in years or in legislative experience, but all alike have been marks for the arrows of the grim Archer, who has respected neither youth nor age nor party. The frequency of the deaths in this House reminds us of the truth of what the great Latin poet declared when he said:

Pallida mors aequo pulsat pedo
Pauperum tabernas, regumque turres.

Peasants and princes, the rich and the poor, the member of Congress and the humblest of his constituency are alike subject to the immutable law of mortality. As frequent and sudden and unexpected as have been the deaths of members of this House, yet the death of none came so unexpectedly or caused more sadness than that of our lamented friend, Hon. SAMUEL T. BAIRD, of Louisiana. Young, in the very prime of life, strong in body, boasting that he had never known a day's sickness, manly in form and handsome in appearance, the very picture of health; surely no one who knew him and saw him as he appeared in the Fifty-fifth Congress, during the last session, would have believed or predicted that ere the members should reach their homes, and ere the spring should come and clothe the earth with flowers, he would have fallen a victim to the insatiable enemy of mankind.

During the last week of the Fifty-fifth Congress he was taken suddenly ill and, after lingering for eight weeks, died in this city on the 22d day of April, 1899. It was indeed a sad death—away from his home, to which he continually during his sickness expressed his desire to return—in a city of strangers, with his youngest son, a bright and beautiful boy, lying in an adjoining room, hovering between life and death; with his faithful and devoted wife, distracted with grief at the coming death of her husband and the suffering of the child—all the surroundings united to make it sorrowful in the extreme and to excite the sympathy and pity of all.

He had been elected to this Congress without opposition, and from his devotion to his duties as a member, from his high sense of honor and integrity, from his careful attention to the interests of his constituents and the interests of the common country as well, and from his ability and the popularity he so justly enjoyed amongst his own people, there was every evidence that he had entered upon a Congressional career which was to grow more illustrious in the future. But to all of these hopes of his friends and this promotion which he gave promise of death put an end; and when we met in December we looked in vain for him, and listened in vain for his voice, which was still, and longed for the touch of his vanished hand.

SAM BAIRD, as those who knew him called him, was possessed of those qualities which attracted men to him. He was generous; he was noble; he was courteous and courtly and true; he was manly and brave, as gentle as a woman, as courageous as a knight in the defense of what he deemed to be right. No one who came to know him well but loved and admired him. To those who were fortunate enough to be classed as his friends he exhibited a devotion and fidelity which is rare among men. Deception formed no part of his character. You could rest implicitly upon his word and know that when once given it would be fulfilled; and no greater tribute can be paid to him, as we stand to-day over his newmade grave, than to say: "To his own self he was true, and therefore he was false to no man."

The career of Mr. BAIRD, though short in years, was a remarkable one. He was a lawyer, admitted to the bar in 1882, and from the time of his admission until his death enjoyed the confidence of his clients and engaged in an active practice. As a lawyer he was devoted to those principles which lie at the foundations of this great profession, and he practiced his profession according to the teachings and doctrines of those great lawyers who have illustrated and illumined it. In all of his professional life there was no act that was not in full accord with the principles that should guide an upright, conscientious, and ethical lawyer. Not only was he distinguished in his profession as a practitioner, but he had scarcely been at the bar two years when he had gained such distinction that he was elected district attorney of his judicial district.

In this office he displayed that ability which so distinguished him and those qualities of high character and devotion to duty which so easily marked him. In the discharge of his duties as prosecuting attorney he received the approbation of those amongst whom he lived; and while he prosecuted crime and endeavored to convict and punish it, he was careful that innocence should not suffer. At the end of four years' service in the office of prosecuting attorney he was called by the people of his district to be judge, and he served four years upon the bench as such. In that important position he was just, impartial, and upright, patient in hearing the cases before him, fair and firm in his judicial decisions. No charge of partiality was ever made, and he left the bench honored and respected by all as an upright judge. No one who had witnessed his administration of the high office of judge could but say, and all did say, that he wore the ermine most worthily.

He was a member of the legislature of his native State, having been elected to the State senate in 1896, and in that body served upon some of the most important committees. So ably and efficiently did he discharge his duty as a member of the State legislature that in the fall of 1896, when his district came to select and nominate a man to represent it in the halls of Congress, he was almost unanimously chosen for this high office.

Thus, step by step, from the young lawyer to the prosecuting attorney, from the prosecuting attorney's office to that of judge and a seat on the bench, from the bench to the halls of the State legislature, from the halls of State legislation to the National Congress, was the rapid progress of this man, whose life and death we commemorate to-day as fitting evidence of his character, worth, and the esteem in which he was held by the people amongst whom he lived.

In all his professional career he discharged his duty with ability, integrity, and fidelity to the truth, and as a legislator and member of Congress he was guided by the same lights.

He was a devoted husband and a fond father. It was my pleasure to know him as such. I was intimately associated with him, living in the same hotel in Washington, and it was indeed a beautiful thing to see and know the devotion that existed between him and his wife; and no words can express or language convey the sad and sorrowful scene I witnessed the day he died. The wife, broken down by long weeks of care and attention, both to the sick and dying husband and the afflicted child, had bravely stood the terrible ordeal and trial until the dreadful announcement was made that he was no more, and nature could stand no more, and in the anguish and sorrow of her heart she wanted to know why she could not have been taken and he spared. But the ways of Providence are past finding out, and the widow and orphan now live, and the stalwart, strong, and healthy man is dead. May He who holds the universe in His hand, and doeth all things well, and marks each sparrow's fall comfort her broken heart, bind up her wounds, and be a Father to her fatherless children, that they may live to illustrate in their lives the character and qualities of their lamented father.

In no place or position in which he was called to discharge a duty did he fail to so act as to receive the approbation of his own conscience and the approval of his own people. And thus we find that they recognized his worth and character, and were ever ready to promote and advance him; but just as he had reached the highest office in their gift, just as new honors were about to be bestowed upon him, without warning the summons came to him to lay his burdens down and to cross the river whose waves wash the great unknown shores of Eternity.

And he is dead:

> The earth that bears him dead
> Bears not alive a truer gentleman.

But through the mist that blinds us here, we look beyond and feel that while it is true that we shall see him no more—that the grave covers all that is mortal of our friend—he is not dead. That which made him noble, true, and brave can never die.

Although with bowed heads and saddened hearts we have borne his senseless dust to rest and said, "He is dead," yet he is not dead:

> He has but passed
> Beyond the mist that blinds us here,
> Into the new and larger life
> Of that serener sphere.
> And ever near us, though unseen,
> The dear, immortal spirits tread,
> For all the boundless universe
> Is Life! There are no dead.

Mr. MEEKISON. Mr. Speaker, the death of Mr. BAIRD was a great shock to me. I could not realize that the vigorous young man with bright eyes and firm grasp who had greeted me but a short time before in the Chamber was no more.

He had just been elected for the second time to this House and was full of hope and confidence.

He was in the noon of young manhood, strong and vigorous, keen and alert; all predicted for him a long and useful career in this House, and little did I think that he would have been so soon cut down.

We must all meet death, and it matters little whether it is extended a few years longer or not. Still no philosophy reconciles us to the death of one so young and promising, or to the family that knows best what his loss means.

Mr. Speaker, it was my sad duty to accompany the remains of our brother to his former home in Louisiana, and I can say that the old proverb that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country" did not apply to our departed friend. We went through two towns in his district, and as a tribute to his memory and worth business was suspended. In his home town everywhere was evidence of sincere sorrow. To all it seemed like a personal bereavement.

The older men mourned a son, the younger that of a brother. Had I not known Mr. BAIRD in this House the touching tributes that were universal from his neighbors and townsmen would have proven him to be a man in whom public confidence rested and who could be trusted. Those who knew him best loved and trusted him most.

Almost since attaining his majority he has been in the public service, as district attorney, district judge, a member of his State legislature, and member of Congress.

Such long and varied public service is not chance, but proof of sterling qualities, faithful service, duty well done.

Mr. Speaker, this faithful public servant, tender husband and father, sleeps in his native Southland where flowers ever bloom and it is always summer.

If his years had been prolonged, I am sure his services would have been valuable to his State and the country and his death a great loss to each.

May he rest in peace.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, he had been a district attorney, a district judge, a State senator, and a Representative in Congress, and he died at 38 years of age. This is a brief statement of the life and career of SAMUEL T. BAIRD.

In thinking of the death of our departed friend it has occurred to me that the grim Reaper has been unusually remorseless in his treatment of the Fifty-sixth Congress. Seven Representatives in the Fifty-fifth Congress who were elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress died before entering upon their duties in the present House of Representatives. Mr. Dingley, of Maine; Mr. Greene, of Nebraska; Mr. Bland, of Missouri; Mr. Danford, of Ohio; Mr. Ermentrout, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Settle, of Kentucky, and Mr. BAIRD, of Louisiana, were the conspicuous figures that were stricken down by the fell destroyer.

Mr. Speaker, if I had been asked during the last Congress to select a dozen men whose physique, youthfulness, and health indicated long life, I would have readily selected Mr. BAIRD as one of them. He was a fine specimen of manly beauty, and I think he was easily the handsomest in the Fifty-fifth Congress. He was tall, erect, and well proportioned. He was graceful in his carriage, commanding in his appearance, and, withal, courteous in his treatment of everybody.

I never knew Mr. BAIRD until the Fifty-fifth Congress met in extraordinary session in March, 1897. He and I came to that Congress as new men upon this scene of action. We were assigned to the same committee—the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Perhaps no man here knows better than I do of his devotion to public duty. That committee was charged with, among other things, the consideration of one of the most important measures proposed in the last Congress, and one of the most important that has been proposed in this Congress—the ship-subsidy scheme. I believe that at all hearings and arguments had before that committee Mr. BAIRD was always in attendance. He was a good listener, an industrious student, and a good judge of the worth of any argument. He was always faithful in his endeavor to find the facts and the reasons that should underlie any action that Congress was proposing to take. He was a man of strong convictions. He did not thrust his opinions on other people, but he asserted them and maintained them ably and fearlessly when it became necessary for him to act or to declare his convictions.

But, Mr. Speaker, SAM BAIRD, as those who knew him best always called him, has gone from among us. I shall not attempt to express my own feelings over the personal loss that I sustained, and I am unable to pay a fitting tribute to his memory. His successor, Mr. RANSDELL, said a moment ago that men loved SAM BAIRD. That is a beautiful tribute to pay a man, and very beautiful here, because it is so true. There is not an associate of his in the last Congress or in this Congress who did not respect, admire, and love him. He was not of a cold, metallic nature. He was ambitious, but not selfish or envious. He was gifted, learned, warm-hearted, generous, and always considerate. While he rests now in the bosom of his native Louisiana I have come to offer a few flowers of affectionate regard.

Mr. BAIRD, I doubt not, went to his death as bravely as any soldier on any crimson field. He did not believe that it was all of life to live, or that death was the end of all. He looked beyond that to that life which comes after this transitory existence. In faith he belonged to the Anglican communion. He believed in the resurrection of the dead and in the life everlasting. His life was a useful one and was made up of a series of successes. He was taken away just when his career in the broader field of national affairs had begun. We need not speculate as to why his useful and still more promising career was so soon ended. There is no philosophy that can explain the enigma of life or the mystery of death except the highest and most beautiful and truest of all philosophy, the Christian religion. And in the presence of the dead even that can offer us no more than the consolation of a sublime faith in the goodness of the great Father and the blessed promises of His revealed religion. Let us cherish the memory of the dead and follow his example of devotion to duty. We shall not have among us a more faithful Representative than SAMUEL T. BAIRD. We shall not look upon a manlier man.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe that I knew SAM BAIRD better personally than any of his colleagues of the Fifty-fifth Congress. I can not pronounce studied eulogiums upon his life and character. I can only undertake to give utterance to those feelings that are pulsating in my heart to-day, when I remember him as my friend. I believe that I knew him as intimately as any man with whom he was ever associated. Not only did I know him in public life, but I knew him in private life. His life in the midst of his family enriched it with the most tender love and the purest happiness.

I do not wonder that his career as district attorney in the State of Louisiana was a remarkable one for a young man, so faithful was he in his devotion to duty and law. I do not marvel that he adorned the bench of his State in such a brilliant manner while serving as district judge, so accurate was his splendid intellect and so warm and merciful were the feelings of his great heart.

I am not surprised that he was a man amongst men as a legislator in the State of Louisiana, so accomplished was he as a scholar and so loyal to the rights of his fellow-man. And while I speak of him to-day, I shall give utterance only to those things that I do know about him and his character.

I was with him frequently during the Fifty-fifth Congress and studied his character. I knew his characteristics as a man and feel that I may be pardoned for alluding to a few of them.

He was one of the few men that I have ever known that was as gentle as a woman and as brave as the bravest. He was loyal and faithful to his friends, and during my association with him I never knew him to pass any sort of criticism upon a friend. If they were liable to error, if they had their weaknesses and were justly subject to criticism by others, SAM BAIRD always withheld criticism and helped to sustain his friends. He was a conservative and broad-minded member of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

He had his opinions and his convictions, and they were always based upon thorough investigation and upon his best deliberate judgment. He was ready to defend those convictions upon any and all occasions. So much did the man despise error and hate wrong that he combated it whenever and wherever he met it. For two years I enjoyed the very closest personal friendship with him, and I can truthfully say that there was never a day that I associated with him but what I saw some magnificent quality about his character that deserved to be emulated. His life as a public man, his keen appreciation of justice and equity, and his hundreds of manly qualities should be recorded as a rich heritage to the youth of his State.

We do not know why he was stricken down in the prime of life. The reason for these things are not revealed to us, but we do know that there must have been some good reason by the overruling Providence. When he was taken from amongst his colleagues the State of Louisiana lost one of its most influential members. He was not an obtrusive individual, but had a wonderful influence over his colleagues, and we can not point to a single young member of that Congress that could accomplish so much in a modest and unassuming way as could SAMUEL T. BAIRD, of Louisiana. His patience was a marvel of sweetness and influence, and his tolerance a tower of overwhelming strength.

Mr. Speaker, when in Washington, just before his great soul took its flight and the death angel was hovering over him, summoning him to the great Unknown, I was profoundly happy to learn that he communed with his family and friends, and, with that superb courage that characterized all his acts, assured them that he did not fear the issue, that he was ready to go, and would enter into the great eternity with that sublime faith and hope that sustains the true Christian. We never talked of religion or that undiscovered hereafter, but I felt and knew that the great God, who had fashioned and finished such a magnificent character, had tenanted his immortal soul with a blessed belief that would lead him out from the walks of men to the bosom of our Redeemer.

Louisiana can ill afford to lose such a Representative. Many sunny days will pass in that great old State, the place of his nativity, before she sends to this body a completer gentleman or a better rounded character. Well may the citizens of his State cherish his memory and public deeds and boast that this far Southern clime produced this superb and remarkable young man.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, it is ever a sad occasion when this great body pauses in its accustomed activity to mourn the loss of one of its members. What a perpetual reminder, indeed, is it of the uncertainty of human life and what an admonition to those who would accomplish much here not to be laggards. He whose memory we here revere and to whom we here pay possibly the last sad earthly rites until the triumphant blast of the summoning angel shall clothe his bones with flesh again was in many respects a remarkable man.

SAMUEL T. BAIRD was born in Louisiana in 1861 and was educated in that State and at Vincennes, Ind. At 18 we find him studying law. Three years later he was admitted to the bar. At 23 he was elected district attorney of the Sixth Louisiana judicial district and filled that difficult and laborious position with so much ability that at the expiration of the term of four years, in 1888, when only 27 years of age, he was elected the judge of that district. After serving his people for four years on the bench with great distinction, he withdrew from active participation in politics and returned to the practice of his profession. But in 1896 his people called him back to it by electing him a member of the State senate, and while a member of that body he was both prominent and active, easily taking the leadership.

He was the chairman of the committee on railroads and a member, besides, of such important committees as judiciary, lands and levees, and elections. From that time his promotion became even more rapid. A strong, an earnest, and a consistent Democrat, his party loved to honor him no less than the people of his section, for no sooner had he entered the senate than he was elected the chairman of the joint Democratic caucus of the general assembly, and a few months later the Democratic State convention elected him both its temporary chairman and a delegate to the national Democratic convention held at Chicago in the summer of that year. Having supported the candidacy of the great leader of the "common people" and assisted in his nomination for President, upon his return home his people, loving him as they did, saw no fitter compliment to pay this intrepid young Democratic leader than to nominate and elect him to the Fifty-fifth Congress. He was reelected to the Fifty-sixth Congress with practical unanimity. He died at the age of 38. So that when he had scarcely reached the prime of his magnificent manhood we find him to have filled all the important positions of prosecuting attorney, judge, State senator, and twice elected to this body. In the Democratic party of his State he was equally honored and respected, even as he was by his own people.

I knew BAIRD well and intimately. A young man of marked ability, of splendid virtue, wise, honest, honorable; a man whose word was sacred and who never forsook a cause he once espoused; a man whose judgment was rarely, if ever, at fault; aggressive, yet tractable; stern when occasion required, yet just always. Of superb physique, who would have thought to look upon him at the last session of the Fifty-fifth Congress that death should gather him in its cold embrace before the convening of the Fifty-sixth?

While his career in public life was brief, it was brilliant. It does indeed seem hard that one so young and useful should so soon be called to the judgment seat. And when the thread of life is cut suddenly and without premonition, the finite mind is apt to question the inscrutable justice of Him who shapes it and rounds it and terminates him. So it was with me. I felt startled and shocked when I heard of BAIRD'S untimely death. But, after all, the culmination of physical life is death, and who knows but that the early accomplishment of the end is not a mark of Omnipotent favor and esteem?

> And if through patient toil we reach the land
> Where tired feet, with sandals loose, may rest,
> Where we shall clearly see and understand,
> I think that we will say, "God knew the best."

In his death the Democratic party of Louisiana suffered great loss, and Louisiana herself lost a well-beloved son, who was destined to play no unimportant part in carving her destiny. Sad to us was the parting; sad to his many friends here, but sadder than all was his loss to his own people who so loved him, and loving him so uniformly honored him.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, well do I recall the sad rites paid the remains of SAMUEL T. BAIRD. The people of north Louisiana, who had so loved and honored him in life, now crowded about the bier that bore him to mourn his loss. From all over the district they came and by all manner of conveyances, until the beautiful village among the hills was filled with the gathered multitude. The church bell summoned all, and on the sad, solemn march to the grave there joined men of all classes and conditions and colors.

Out of the pretty church and of Bastrop we slowly moved, and on the side of a hill of red clay, amid the tall pines that stood as sentinels around, in stern silence, we buried him, and then reluctantly the multitude departed and dispersed as the sun dipped in the ocean on the west.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolution in memory of my late colleague from the Fifth Congressional district, SAMUEL T. BAIRD, and to pay a brief and humble tribute to his private virtues and public services.

The graphic sketch presented by my friend Mr. RANSDELL, his successor on the floor of this House, depicts a character at once courteous and gentle, with a firmness and devotion to high principle that readily explains the esteem and honors bestowed upon him by a community always ready to appreciate noble and manly qualities.

His record seems brief, yet it covers a period fraught with vital issues to his State and section. Though but a youth, he appeared upon the active scenes of political life and bore a man's part at an epoch to recall which now seems like reviving a painful dream. The State of Louisiana was fast bound in misery and chains; it was held in the iron grasp of an alien rule, under which neither its intelligence nor property had a voice. By the devastation of the civil war the State had been left but a few years before literally a wreck, ruined and desolate.

It fell to the youth and growing manhood of that day to retrieve these disasters; the rebuilding the waste places, the restoration of paralyzed industries, the reorganization of society, education, and the healthful process of recovery; to fight for the building up again the material prosperity and political future of a despondent and oppressed people.

In all these difficult tasks young BAIRD bore a conspicuous and honorable part, leading with energy and enthusiasm, tempered by wisdom, to a better sentiment, inspiring his community with greater courage to face and solve the mighty problems that confronted them.

He came to the Fifty-fifth Congress full of hope and spirit, amply equipped for the performance of high and responsible duties; and in his service, alas, too brief, he early developed qualities of usefulness and success. With characteristic modesty he spoke but rarely and aimed at no display; yet he neglected no public duty. He wasted no time in dissipation. He was practical, laborious, and after careful study of all the public questions that came up he formed his opinions quietly and firmly. Thoughtful, observant, and upright, courteous, yet frank and truthful, everyone knew where to find him.

To speak the truth, to avow and defend the right, to follow the line of duty, were the ambitions of this young statesman, called away before he had reached the meridian of his life and the full maturity of his powers.

His colleagues loved and honored this noble son of Louisiana. We shall ever remember with pleasant thought the dear friend; his inborn grace, the courteous mien, the kindly, frank tone, the countenance in which never lurked an ignoble thought.

And as he winged his flight while yet in the prime of early manhood, the words from Festus match well with the aspirations, the soul and aims of him whom we commemorate to-day:

> Life is more than breath and the quick round of blood;
> It is a great spirit and a busy heart.
> The coward and the small in soul scarce do live
> One generous feeling—one great thought—one deed
> Of good, ere night, would make life longer seem
> Than if each year might number a thousand days
> Spent as this is by nations of mankind.
> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). In accordance with the resolution adopted by the House, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of our deceased colleague, the House stands adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of James S. Oakley against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the President of the United States Civil Service Commission, relating to an amendment to the estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives relating to the shipment, distribution, etc., of the oleomargarine product—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of names of civilian engineers employed on river and harbor work—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Maurice River, New Jersey—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6163) granting a pension to Flavel H. Van Eaton—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I present a resolution adopted by the Fourth Biennial Convention of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and, as the shortest way to state its substance, I will read it:

Whereas we believe the laws of nature demand that man should have at least one day's rest out of seven, and if the great political and industrial questions are to receive intelligent consideration at the hands of the toiling masses more time must be given them for recuperation and thought; and as Sunday, the first day of the week, is observed more than any other day of the week for rest, and therefore can be easily reserved as a rest day, and as the growing demand of the public for Sunday trains and the eagerness of railroad companies to increase dividends by running Sunday trains threatens to entirely deprive the railway employees of a day of rest: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That while we realize the quasi-public nature of our positions and that it is our duty to meet all reasonable demands of the public and of our employers, we believe a rest day is just as dear to us as it is to all other classes; and the demands made upon us for Sunday service are unreasonable. We believe the adoption of the refrigerator car has removed all necessity for the moving of perishable freight on Sunday; that no harm can come from the unloading of live stock to rest over Sunday; that the demand of the public for Sunday trains by railroad companies for the purpose of pleasure and convenience, and the running of trains by railroad companies for the purpose of increasing dividends, come from selfish motives, which experience has taught us can not be overcome by suasion, and as there seems to be no hope of our having a rest day unless it be secured by legislative enactment, we urge the United States Industrial Commission and Congress to investigate this question; and we earnestly ask that Congress pass a law which will prohibit the running of Sunday trains on all interstate railroads; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the United States Senate, the House of Representatives, the United States Industrial Commission, the press, and be printed in the Trainmen's Journal.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of George R. Fuller and 5 other railway mail clerks of Waterville, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. McMILLAN presented petitions of D. E. Prall & Co. and sundry other druggists of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Mrs. M. K. East and Mrs. C. S. Willoughby, on behalf of sundry citizens of Duquoin, Ill., praying that the word "male" be omitted from the suffrage clause of the constitution to be framed for the government of Cuba, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the petition of Underhill & Kittridge, of Concord, N. H., and the petition of Andrew P. Preston, of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 793) providing for the adjustment of the swamp-land grant to the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 631) for the relief of James and William Crooks, of Canada, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. KYLE. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 919) granting a pension to James Ballard, to submit an adverse report thereon, and to ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely, the claimant having died one year ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be agreed to, and the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 763) to aid the State of South Dakota to support schools of mines, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2746) to aid the public-land States to support schools of mines; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 779) for the relief of the Potomac Steamboat Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ESTATE OF GEORGE W. LAWRENCE.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to recall a report made a few days ago from the Committee on Claims on the bill (S. 739) for the relief of the estate of George W. Lawrence and substitute the one I send to the desk. It is to correct an error, the wrong report having accompanied the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and substituted for the one heretofore made.

REPORT OF NICARAGUA CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, 1897-1899, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

MRS. ANN M. SMITH, DECEASED.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Committee on Pensions may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 530) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann M. Smith, widow of the late Maj. Gen. Andrew J. Smith, and that the bill be brought before the Senate and indefinitely postponed, as Mrs. Smith died only a few days ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order will be entered discharging the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of the bill and postponing the bill indefinitely.

C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE. I introduce two bills for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I ask that they be printed with the documents which acccompany them and sent to that committee.

The bill (S. 2726) providing for the disposition of unclaimed property of beneficiaries of a naval home dying intestate was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which was ordered to be printed.

The bill (S. 2727) authorizing payment of commutation of ration to the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2728) granting a pension to Fritz Meyer; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with the bill I present the petition of Fritz Meyer. I move that the bill and accompanying petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 2729) granting a pension to Eliza L. Reese; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to William V. Carr (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2731) granting an increase of pension to P. W. Wilcox; and

A bill (S. 2732) granting an increase of pension to James Cunningham (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. DANIEL introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (by request) (S. 2733) for the relief of the legal representative of John Avery, deceased;

A bill (by request) (S. 2734) for the relief of the heirs of William Pollock (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2735) for the relief of the estate of Dr. Bailey Shumate; and

A bill (by request) (S. 2736) for the relief of the personal representative of John Johns, deceased (with accompanying papers).

Mr. MASON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2737) to increase the rating of pensions for disease, wounds, or injuries received while in line of duty;

A bill (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to James M. Munn (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2739) granting a pension to Lorenzo D. Brinker (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 2740) for the relief of Thomas Sherman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2741) for the relief of Valentine Lapham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2742) restoring to the pension roll the name of Annie A. Gibson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2743) for the relief of Caleb Wollpert; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2744) to create an additional life-saving district, and authorizing certain changes in the serial numbers of existing districts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NELSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2745) to amend section 10 of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2747) to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana territory by the United States, by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, forest, and sea, in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Garret A. Hobart, late Vice-President of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $30,000 for the payment of subsistence and transportation money to certain Cherokee Indians for removal from Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and other States to the present Cherokee Nation, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED MISSOURI MILITIA REGIMENTS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I submit a resolution to provide for the reprint of a document, and ask for its present consideration. The document comprises only a page and a half.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of Senate Document No. 130 of the second session Fifty-fifth Congress, relative to the pensionable status of the Enrolled Missouri Militia regiments.

SUITS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of the act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States, approved March 3, 1887.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of the act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1899.

Mr. COCKRELL. Those resolutions provide for a reprint of documents that have been exhausted in the document room and for which calls are frequently made.

SHIP CANAL IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made and an estimate submitted of the cost of constructing a ship canal to connect Puget Sound with Grays Harbor, via the Chehalis River, in the State of Washington, in accordance with recommendations heretofore made and filed with the War Department.

TREATY RELATIVE TO SAMOAN ISLANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether the people of Samoa were consulted or their wishes ascertained in relation to the treaty recently made between the United States and Germany in relation to said islands. The President is also requested to inform the Senate whether any protest has been received by him or the Department of State from the people of Samoa, or any of them, against said treaty.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the resolution be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over under the rule.

ELECTION OF SECRETARY AND SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of the following officers, in the order named: First, Secretary of the Senate, and second, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Charles G. Bennett, of New York, be, and is hereby, chosen Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That Daniel M. Ransdell, of Indiana, be, and is hereby, chosen Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether the resolution does not instantly displace the officials instead of taking effect on the 1st of the month, when the oath is taken?

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, both these officers are required to take an oath of office, and they are not in office until that oath is taken. It is understood that these offices shall be changed on the 1st day of February, for the convenience of accounting.

Mr. HOAR. So I understood. I have not investigated the matter and have not thought of it until this moment; but it occurs to me that where, as in an ordinary nomination for office by the President, the phrase is to take effect as soon as the successor is qualified, and frequently in those cases when the appointments are made that is one thing, but where there is a distinct appointment of a new officer it may be held to take effect immediately. Suppose Mr. Bennett should die, would the present official remain the Secretary of the Senate for a year when a new person has been appointed by the Senate? I merely ask that question. I am not answering it myself. I think it would be better in each of the resolutions to state that the resolutions shall take effect on the 1st of February, 1900. But the Senator from Iowa will give his reasons for the present form.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to inserting those words if the Senator thinks it would be safer?

Mr. HOAR. I think it is safer; certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. TELLER. Let the pending resolution be read again. Let us see what it says.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Senators about me seem so confident that there is a sufficient practice grown up and that it is so uniform as to control this matter that I shall not make any further suggestion about it, though my own impression remains unchanged.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sure that the effect of the resolution will be as stated by me, and unless the Senator thinks the amendment important it can be adopted in its present form.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the understanding that these officers will not take the oath until the 1st day of February.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the understanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say there is no question about that. Now, if anyone after having taken the oath of office should undertake to draw pay for the few days preceding the 1st of February I think we would have the power to stop it, and I believe the Senate would peremptorily and arbitrarily exercise the power.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. So I think no harm will come if we pass the resolution in the present form.

Mr. ALLISON. No officer of this body can draw pay until he takes the oath of office.

Mr. HOAR. A question might arise in this way, for instance: Suppose the present Secretary of the Senate should sign a subpœna for a witness or an order for the arrest of a witness who refuses to obey the summons; the question is whether his authority continues. But, as I said, I do not press the point.

Mr. CULLOM. Question.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that a vote may be taken on the pending resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the statements made before the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to the effect of the reciprocity treaties made between the United States and the several foreign governments on the revenues and industries of the United States be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings or proceedings as may be had before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

IRRIGATION ON THE GILA RIVER, ARIZONA.

Mr. CARTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate the results of the investigation by the Geological Survey on the general conditions and cost of water storage for irrigation on the Gila River, Arizona, for the benefit of the Indians occupying the Gila River Reservation, as prepared by the consulting engineer of said investigation.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I desire to take a moment upon a question of privilege, as I understand the rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. MASON. I ask first to have read the following statement from the English consul located at New Orleans.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

[New York Times, January 14.]

BRITISH CONSUL GROWS ANGRY—REPRESENTATIVE AT NEW ORLEANS ACCUSES AMERICAN PEOPLE OF ACTING IN BAD FAITH.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 13, 1900.

Arthur G. Vansittart, the British consul to this city, entertains some very drastic views with reference to American methods generally and American friendships in particular, and he does not hesitate to express his opinions on the subject. Speaking to-day on the present attitude of the people of the United States on the war in the Transvaal, he said:

"The English people are thoroughly disgusted with the way the people of this country are acting, and can not understand the bombast and political buncombe which seems to actuate the Congress. To-day the American people are against Great Britain, because the Boers have been successful so far in the South African war. To-morrow the English will be successful and the sentiment will undergo a complete and rapid change. Why? Simply because it's the nature of the American people, who are mercenary in everything they do; but what the English can not comprehend is the bombast of the Senators at Washington, who, to secure a reelection, make political capital by shouting out patriotic encouragement to the enemies of Great Britain, while in private they are anti-Boer in their opinions.

"Can it be that the people of the United States have so soon forgotten that in their war against Spain British ships were seized and held as prizes of war for months before a prize court passed on the legality of the seizure? England made no protest then, but quietly awaited the action of the court. But when American goods are seized at Delagoa Bay, the Americans send up a great cry that England has trampled on their rights, and expect the matter to be adjusted within twenty-four hours. International law recognizes the right of any nation at war with another to seize anything which is contraband of war. Should a mistake be made, why, it is rectified as soon as possible, and there the matter should end.

"But what are the people of my country to think when such men as Senator MASON adopt the rôle of mountebank in the Senate Chamber of the United States and hurl invectives at England, the friend, and encourages the half-civilized people who are fighting her? I have been in this country five years, and understand fully what it all means. I know nothing can come of it except votes from the constituency for whose benefit it was done. It was never intended that such speeches should change the friendly relations between England and the United States; consequently it was all for show and for votes. I know these men, and I know they are double-faced. They say one thing to-day and to-morrow express sentiments directly to the contrary. There is no faith to be put in them. The Administration at Washington understands the status of affairs perfectly and is very friendly to England. If the people of the country were as well informed as the Administration there would be much less political capital made of such buncombe as Senator MASON makes use of."

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I shall take but just a moment upon this matter. It is hardly worth attention except that it is the expression of one of the accredited representatives of England to the United States. I want to call his attention and the attention of his friends to the fact that it is not the first time when an English diplomat has attempted to run the politics of this country; but having begun thus early in the campaign to injure the Administration—the party in power—I thought it well enough to call attention early that it might not have the same effect it had when President Cleveland was in the White House.

So far as his personal attacks upon me are concerned, of course they do me great honor. My correspondent who sent it to me suggested that it be called to the attention of the State Department and dignify his assault upon me in that way. I have no doubt the State Department would give me all the protection it gives to any American citizen and that the State Department would give every American citizen any protection that it could, but as for me, I am for the Boers, and the more of English stupidity and assininity that come in this country from men of this class the more sure the American people are to become educated on the real merits of this case.

I made no assault upon the English people in my speech in favor of the Boers. I said they were our friends, but that the Government as contradistinguished from the people never had been our friends. We had friends in England during the Revolutionary war—men who stood and answered for the American people. The people were our friends in England during the civil war. Lincoln said in his great speech to the working people of this country that the working people had always been foremost upon the right side, and I could have paid no higher compliment to the English people than to recall the language of Lincoln when he said that the starving weavers refused to give aid and comfort to their own home Government that recognized the belligerency of the Southern Confederacy. Although their looms were empty and they were starving, they stood for the maintenance of our Union and would rather starve than strike a blow for slavery.

Cheap men coming from England in the diplomatic or consular service, who are permitted to come to this country as the friends of this country and who misquote the statements made by Senators of the United States, only call attention to the avarice and the cowardice and the brutality of the English Government. I speak of the English Government. I had in that very speech quoted from the language of the distinguished Senator who now occupies the chair. When asking for a resolution in favor of the Armenians, he called attention to the difference between the English people and the English Government, and you may remember that when I quoted from him I called attention to the distinction between the Government of England and the feeling of the people of that country.

I say to-day that from the best information I have among the enlightened people of Scotland, judging from their press and from correspondence, not half of them favor this cruel war against the Boers for the destruction of their Republic; not one-tenth in Ireland favor it, and 95 per cent of the American people to-day, if you can judge by the expression of public meetings and the press, are in favor of the maintenance of liberty and the continuance of the Republic of South Africa.

Now, Mr. President, I do not care for any special defense from the State Department. I shall endeavor, with the help of God, to take care of myself from that class of cattle—people who are sent here to this country under English pay and who have an open sesame through the American papers to belittle every effort that I have been able to make to get an expression from the American Congress along the line laid down when we began at an early day to follow the suggestion of Webster: Since the kings have formed a combine, let us answer with a combination of the republics.

Mr. President, before I sit down I desire to make an inquiry and one further suggestion. I suppose the records of the Senate would show, but there has been a dispute as to where the treaty of arbitration now is, whether it is in the State Department or before the Senate committee. I understand that it is before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, or has been favorably reported and is now before the Senate. I refer to the treaty of The Hague, the arbitration treaty, I should say.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a matter of executive business. The Senator can ascertain that fact from the records of the executive sessions.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to do anything that it is not proper for everyone to do. I merely wanted to state that I saw a statement somewhere that it had not been sent to the Senate, and I saw another statement that it had been sent.

Mr. DAVIS. It has been sent to the Senate.

Mr. MASON. That is all I wanted to know; and I was going simply to say that so far as one vote is concerned I should like to have an opportunity, and I have no doubt the Senator from Minnesota will give us an opportunity, to vote upon it. There has been a petition filed with the executive department; and I presented a petition to the United States Senate which claimed to represent nearly 100,000 names, which was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That petition was a prayer of the people of this country that under a certain section, I think section 3, the American people should intervene as a friendly nation and that under that section we could intervene or tender our friendly services without violating the law of nations as between friendly powers.

I am informed that one of the reasons given—and it is one of the reasons given by some of my colleagues here—why they do not favor the stopping of this bloody war that is going on to destroy a republic, a bloody war that is without parallel in all history—that they can not consider the question of intervention because the Senate has not ratified the treaty of arbitration. If that is so, I simply add my petition to that of the others which have been presented to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I say I add my petition with perfect respect, for I do not intend to be disrespectful in this or any other thing. Out of 70,000,000 people not one has ever protested against it, so far as I know. If that is so, let us ratify the treaty and at least take away one of the other barriers which prevent us from asking the right to make a friendly intervention.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I will take the liberty of saying to the Senator from Illinois that the treaty of arbitration has been reported to the Senate.

Mr. MASON. That is all right. I am very glad to hear it. Then I suppose it is not necessarily in the control of any one Senator or any one committee, but that any Senator can call it up. I merely wanted to know about it. We live and learn, and I desire to be good-natured about it.

One other question, Mr. President, and I shall finish for this morning. In the early part of this session I offered a resolution, copied from the Republican platform of 1896, of sympathy for the struggling Boers. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not know how many weeks or months it has been there; but I want to be perfectly fair with the committee, and I intend to be perfectly respectful.

Unless I can get some report, favorable or unfavorable, I shall adopt some other means to get a vote upon that resolution. If there is a majority of Senators opposed to that resolution, I shall be satisfied if we can have a vote taken upon it, and if a majority of the Senate favor it, I want a vote. If the resolution is not fair, change it until it is fair. If our sympathy is not expressed in proper language in the opinion of the majority of this Chamber, let it be changed, but give us a chance.

I shall adopt one of several courses I have in mind. It is only fair to you, gentlemen of the committee, that you should know that I intend to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that resolution, or, if that be deemed unfair and impracticable, I shall introduce another resolution and ask that it be voted on without going to a committee.

I have waited now several weeks since December 6, 1899. The committee has had a great many meetings. The London newspapers, which were kindly sent to me on the morning after I introduced the resolution, contained the statement of a Washington correspondent that he was absolutely sure—I think the words "absolutely sure" were used—he said, "I am credibly informed and am absolutely certain that the Mason resolution will go to the committee and never be resurrected." Not one newspaper alone in London, but every one of them said this, and contained the absolute assurance that the Senate of the United States would never have a chance to vote upon that resolution—another sample of the Senate rules where a majority has nothing to say, if there is a majority. I do not say that there is a majority on this question, but I do say that I am entitled and that the people of the United States are entitled to some expression, and I think it is pretty near time that such an expression should be had.

The Boer war will be over in the next six weeks if the Boer successes continue to be as great as they have been during the last six weeks, and it may be that you gentlemen, who are, as the English statesman says, looking to the winner and willing to change your sentiments every time there is a change in the war cloud, may want to express sympathy for the English instead of for the Boers. [Laughter.] You may, if you please, amend my resolution, but bring it in, I beg of you. Do not take that child to the graveyard, because there will be a resurrection of it every morning after next week until I can get a vote of some kind upon it.

Mr. President, I want the committee to understand me. I do not charge them with trying to smother that child. That would be undiplomatic and unstatesmanlike; but I will say that I have a sneaking sort of suspicion that a majority of the committee want to consider that resolution three years or three months after the war is over. I say it must be considered. You will have to think about it at least once a day or else go into the cloakroom while I am speaking.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to be allowed to say a word on this question of privilege. It seems to me to be a very serious one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] in his impassioned remarks to the Senate possibly draws away the attention of the Senate from the very serious communication that he made at the outset, which is that a consul who is representing a foreign country at one of our most important commercial ports has uttered in the public press a violent attack not only on the character of an individual member of this body, but on the character of the Senate and on the character of the American people; representing the Senate and the people as a mob, without serious convictions, swaying from side to side, and desirous of acting with the winner in a war which is now pending, without regard to the merits of the controversy. It seems to me, as that matter has been brought officially to the attention of this body, it ought not to be dropped without some action; and it seems to me that the action should be to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will, I have no doubt, deal in a proper way with it.

My own hope is that the Committee on Foreign Relations will send the communication to the Secretary of State or to the President for his information. Then the proper action, whatever it may be, will undoubtedly be taken—either the revocation of the exequatur of the consul or the facts be transmitted to the English Government for its information, who would itself deal with the matter. I shall make the motion that the communication laid before the Senate by the Senator from Illinois be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, I wish to add one other word, if I may, and that is, that I regret, for one, the earnest and impassioned attack which has been made in the Senate by the Senator from Illinois upon the Government of a friendly nation. I know the kind and liberty-loving heart of that Senator. I know that the attack comes from the most generous motives, that most generous of all human motives—sympathy with a weak power struggling with a strong power. The Boers are a republic of one million, fighting for their life with an empire of four hundred millions, and it is quite natural that the Senator from Illinois should have his sympathies strongly stirred; but, after all, the Senate is a part of the diplomatic power of the United States. Every treaty that is made with a foreign government is made with our advice and consent.

I do not see how my honorable friend from Illinois can hope that his proposed offer of mediation between Great Britain and her spirited and gallant adversary can ever be received or effectual if it is accompanied at the same time with an angry, impassioned attack on the Government of Great Britain, not only with reference to her conduct in the very transaction which we propose to ask her to submit to us as an impartial arbitrator, but also an attack on her character through all history, and an especial charge that she is our bitter enemy, and the information that we have in our hearts now the feelings which her former misconduct was calculated to excite.

My honorable friend from Illinois, in other words, has a resolution before the Committee on Foreign Relations in which he wants us to say, in substance, to Great Britain, "You miserable tyrant, disgraceful and hateful, base and infamous through all history, you are especially base and infamous in your present conduct; now leave your conduct in this question to us as an impartial and just and calm arbitrator." It seems to me that is not a very logical position for us to take. I have myself hoped that the time would come when in this Boer war either the express offer from our Government in mediation or the opinion of the people of the United States, calmly and modestly made known, would have its effect on those contending parties and bring about peace—peace with justice and liberty, without which there can be no permanent peace anywhere.

I suppose, Mr. President, that the attitude of the people of the United States in general toward Great Britain is an attitude of warm, cordial friendship (I might almost say an attitude of attachment and love) and that when we think her in the wrong—as we pretty often have had occasion to do and as so many of our people do now—we have the same feeling which patriotic Englishmen have toward their own Government when they think her in the wrong, and the same feelings which patriotic Americans have toward their own Government when they think her in the wrong—valuing her honor, jealous of her honor, desiring that her honor may be preserved unstained.

I do not believe that any considerable number of the American people believe in the doctrine, "Our country, right or wrong." I think the number still less of the American people who would be prepared to follow anybody who says as a corollary from the doctrine "Our country, right or wrong," we are prepared to say, "England, right or wrong," because she sympathized with us in our struggle with Spain. So the feeling of the people of the United States toward England, and the relation of the people of the United States toward England, comes from a good many other sources than the mere conduct of a political party in possession of her Government at some particular time in history.

We remember George III and Lord North, but we remember Chatham and Burke and Charles Fox. We remember Lord Russell, whose sympathies had been against us, but who lived to express his own sense that he had been wrong in his conduct toward us during our rebellion. We think also of the brave and noble workingmen of Lancashire, who said they would prefer to encounter starvation rather than have England interfere to break up the American Union.

We are of the same blood; they are our kith and kin, and whatever a few men may say in the English Government, or a few men may say in the Senate of the United States, the feeling of the American people toward the people of England and the feeling of the English people toward the people of America at this day is a feeling of cordial good will and affection. But it is so much more for that reason have we the right, so much more for that reason are we bound, when we think the Government of England is taking a course injurious to liberty, contrary to justice, and a stain upon her honor, to say so; but we are to say so temperately, quietly, courteously, as lovers and friends speak to lovers and friends, and not in the language of denunciation and abuse; and especially is that true when the utterances come from a part of the diplomatic power of this Republic.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. MASON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is recognized; but the Chair will state that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that a motion has been made to refer.

Mr. HOAR. I made the motion to refer the communication just received to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to refer the newspaper communication—it is to that the Senator refers, as the Chair understands—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, about three years ago—not a very long time—the minister of Spain in this country made a public attack in the newspapers on certain Senators for remarks uttered in the Senate. That seemed to me in the highest degree improper. I called attention to it at the time. I remember very well the criticisms to which I was subjected in the press; I remember very well the indifference, I might almost say the sneers, which I was obliged to encounter in certain quarters.

At that time Spain was engaged in crushing the life out of the people of Cuba—which I considered to be a very great wrong. But that was not the reason that I made objections to the utterances of the Spanish minister. I thought that notice ought to have been taken of those utterances by the Senate of the United States, and I thought notice ought to have been taken of them at that time by the Administration. I do not think that the diplomatic or consular officers of any power, no matter what that power may be, have the right to come into this country and in their diplomatic or consular capacity, shielded as they are by laws of nations, criticise the utterances of Senators or Members of the House of Representatives of the United States. I have not changed my view in regard to that general principle. If a diplomatic or consular officer has made attacks upon Senators or officers of the Government, I think it is a matter which should be brought to the attention of the Administration, and I think notice should be taken of it by them through the proper channels.

I am very glad, Mr. President, that the matter has been received by the Senate in the manner which has been displayed toward it, for I think it is something which can not be too soon understood, that we can not tolerate that sort of thing. It is no worse coming from a British consul than it was coming from the Spanish minister; but at that time we were somewhat divided on the question of the Cubans, and some of the sympathy which flows so strongly toward the Boers—whose magnificent fight for their own firesides and homes commands the admiration of every generous man—that sympathy which flows so generously now for them in all quarters, seemed to me at that time to be stopped and impeded when it was trying to flow toward a people who were being starved to death at the threshold of the United States.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. MASON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution pending before the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I merely desire two or three minutes.

Mr. CARTER. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I do not care to have the Senator yield. I will bring the matter up again, if necessary. I only want two or three minutes to reply to a suggestion made in regard to my question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to feel that I am trespassing on the right of any committee or of any Senator. I am perfectly willing to wait. The principal business of this body is to wait. I have found it so. I introduced this resolution on the 6th of December, and I have been waiting ever since to hear some murmur from the door of that crypt where all resolutions are locked as to which the majority are not favorable and as to which they do not care to have any expression made one way or the other. I have waited from the 6th of December. You gentlemen of the committee should remember that you have had your Christmas turkey in the meantime, and you come back after Christmas and yet you have not passed on that resolution. You have passed into the last year of this century since then, and some of you say into a new century.

I do not care to discuss that, but I expect the reason you have not reached my resolution is because you have been discussing the question of the beginning of the century in your committee. [Laughter.] But on the 6th of December the resolution was sent to you. You kept it all through that beautiful month. During the holidays you had time to think it over. Then came the new year; and yet the resolution of sympathy has not yet been reported; and the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. LODGE], who, with me, sympathized with Cuba and had not then moved up into the class where he could give sneers instead of receiving them, is on the committee. He says that the gallant fight the Boers are making stirs the heart of every fair and generous man, and yet from the 6th of December his heart has been stirred, but the stir has not reached the movement of his lips nor his action in his committee.

The other distinguished Senator from Massachusetts says that we are a part of the treaty-making power, and that we ought to be very careful and gentle. I believe a Massachusetts man once came out to Illinois to teach school, and the committee asked him the question whether he had the fool notion that the world was round. He said it depended upon the committee; that he taught it both ways.

Mr. HOAR. Am I to understand from the Senator that the people of Illinois all thought it was flat at that time?

Mr. MASON. I say the committee was divided upon that subject, but we had an accommodating gentleman from Massachusetts who was willing to teach it both ways for the price. History does not say which way he did teach; but I can not teach both ways. I can not say here in the Senate of the United States that I admire a government after having read their diplomatic papers and spent three months observing the perfidy that has been perpetrated on this man Kruger. At the very opening he suggested arbitration.

This man Milner, Lord Milner, writes to his Government—and there is not a Senator here who would hear me read it, hardly one upon this side of the Chamber; I have been unable to get to read it—in his communication to Chamberlain he says he notified him at once that no arbitration would be considered; that they would "brook no outside interference." He intended to force a fight. He got the glint of the gold and the diamonds that this man Rhodes had shaken before his eyes. He intended to use the British army.

Kruger had a twenty-one-year suffrage. He reduced it to fourteen and then to seven and then practically to five for the uitlander, including the Englishman, and Milner himself said he thought that would be satisfactory to his Government. Kruger gave them everything they asked, and Milner told him to his face, and it is reported that he said in substance, "Your proposition is fair; my Government will probably accept;" but when it was taken to the home Government, there was the determination to bullyrag and browbeat the Boer, to make him fight, that they might kill him. Yet while we sympathize with the Boer, since the 6th of December the committee has not opened its doors or given one moment to the consideration of the resolution.

The distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, who has just taken his seat, remembers that when he was fighting for Cuban independence he taught me the word "mañana." And when I came to the United States Senate I followed his lead for the suffering people there. I ask, Mr. President, only fair play. I can not be a diplomat and talk about the English Government being a nice, gentle pussy cat of a Government when I have read their record in this particular case. If the English flag had been assailed by a foreign power unjustly, and she was fighting for her own land and her own homes, there is not an American or an Irish or a Scotch heart that would not beat for her; but she is fighting to-day to destroy a Republic, and for the first time in the history of our Republic we are silent lipped and cold while the Republic is being destroyed.

No, Mr. President, I am not learned in the art of diplomacy. Language, where I come from, means the way of communicating thought, and not concealing thought and intention. I say that the conduct of the British Government in driving these poor men to war for no other purpose than to use the British army to take their mines and destroy their homes is unjustifiable, and 95 per cent of the American people say, "God bless Paul Kruger and the farmers of South Africa."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not feel like letting this occasion pass without entering, for one, my protest against the abuse of the privilege of free speech in the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate refer the printed communication, to which the Chair takes it the Senator from Massachusetts refers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I desire to reply in just one word. If the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, who always takes opportunity to rebuke me, had done me the favor to have heard read the abuse of the English consul at New Orleans upon me and upon the Senate and upon the American people, he might have found some excuse for me when I rose to defend my own character and the character of the Senate and of the American people; but the Senator from Connecticut did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer the communication to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

SEIZURE OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the resolution which the Chair laid before the Senate, coming over from a former day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 24th instant, as follows:

Whereas food products are not in their nature instruments of warfare; and

Whereas the United States is the greatest producer of such products in the world, and it is therefore essential to our prosperity that these products be freely sold and delivered wherever purchased; and

Whereas to permit such products to be declared contraband of war and subject to seizure by foreign nations at war among themselves would work irreparable injury to the great body of our agricultural population: Therefore,

Resolved, That the United States of America will not recognize the right of any nation to declare food products contraband of war or to seize such products belonging to citizens of the United States or being transported in vessels owned by citizens of the United States, and that any such seizure will be deemed by this Government an act unfriendly to the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the resolution except very briefly. It appears that American flour has been seized by English gunboats on the east coast of Africa. This country is the greatest producer of provisions in the world. I believe it has been the policy of this Government since its foundation to insist that provisions are not contraband of war. In 1794, it is true, we made a treaty with Great Britain by which we agreed that flour or provisions might under certain circumstances be considered contraband of war, but the belligerent nation seizing the provisions should pay the market price and a fair profit. But that treaty was secured under peculiar circumstances. American provisions were on their way in our ships to France, with whom England was at war, and those vessels were seized by the English Government. We protested, insisting that the doctrine was that only things used exclusively in war or absolutely necessary to the carrying on of war should be considered as contraband under the laws of nations.

Finally, as England insisted, we agreed to a treaty which provided that they should pay for the provisions the market price and a fair profit. But that treaty has lapsed by time and is no longer in force. Aside from that I think there is no case in our history where we have not insisted that provisions were not and could not be contraband of war.

We made a treaty in 1846 and another in 1850 with the United States of Colombia and with Salvador, I think, by which we agreed that provisions striving to enter a blockaded port were contraband of war, but these treaties can certainly have no significance and no force because for another reason provisions trying to enter a blockaded port could be seized and confiscated.

Mr. President, I think we ought to have an expression upon this subject, because I do not think we ought for one moment to tolerate the doctrine of preemption, the doctrine that a belligerent can seize our provisions on their way to a neutral port and pay for them, even. Such a doctrine would leave it in the hands of a belligerent power that commanded the seas to make their own rules as to what is contraband of war and when they would have the right of seizure. Besides, the delay and the controversy would ruin our trade. If we admit that provisions can be contraband of war under any circumstances, then a conflict between our two best customers would make the war more ruinous and more injurious to us than though we were engaged in the conflict ourselves. I think, owing to the fact that this question is not thoroughly settled among the other nations of the world, although our position has been clear upon it, some action ought to be taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate on this subject.

In 1885 France declared rice contraband of war that was on its way to any port in China north of Canton. The declaration itself ruined the trade, and therefore there were no seizures. Yet they enunciated the doctrine, and they have never relinquished their position. We have more interest in this subject than any other nation in the world, and we ought to make a clear and distinct declaration about it.

Mr. HALE. Is not this the very trouble, Mr. President? The admission for a moment by us that these food products may be contraband of war destroys the trade. The suspicion, the feeling of doubt in the mind of the shipper that this question may be raised and get into diplomacy and may be continued and strung out destroys American trade. Is not that the whole controversy?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think so, Mr. President. Therefore, I think we ought to insist, and insist very promptly, upon our position and reiterate it and then enforce it. In view of the fact that there is some tendency in the world to declare that war is a conflict between nations and that, therefore, the private property of individuals shall not be taken, the tendency being in the direction of not allowing the seizure of ships upon the sea belonging to the individuals of the nations at war, I believe that nothing shall be considered contraband of war unless there is a treaty stipulation to that effect, and that we ought to insist upon that doctrine.

But certainly, Mr. President, without waiting to go that far, we ought promptly to insist upon our position on this subject. We have already made treaties with very many of the nations of the world by which we have stipulated what is contraband of war. We have treaties with Bolivia, Colombia, Santo Domingo, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Haiti, the Netherlands, Italy, Mexico, Prussia, Salvador, Sweden, Norway, Venezuela, and we did have with Spain, enumerating what is contraband of war; and in none of those treaties are provisions enumerated.

Mr. President, under these circumstances, with those nations so far as their relations with us are concerned, provisions are not contraband of war, and it is so stipulated, because if they could under any circumstances be regarded as contraband of war the treaties would have so enumerated. Therefore, I believe we ought to insist that nothing is contraband of war unless it is stipulated in the treaties. With all other nations but those enumerated we are left to-day to the law of nations and to the decisions of prize courts, which endangers the peace of neutrality, and is a policy that ought not to be tolerated or continued. Neither should we tolerate the doctrine of preemption as to provisions.

That doctrine is, that a belligerent may seize the goods destined to the port of its enemy and pay the market price and a fair profit.

The risk, the delay, the controversy would discourage trade and entail great loss and hardship upon us, and be almost as ruinous as to allow provisions to be declared contraband. I do not know what has been done with the American flour. No answer, I believe, has come to the State Department. But no matter what the answer is, our position upon this question ought to be made clear and distinct and unquestioned. Therefore, I hope the Committee on Foreign Relations will take up this resolution at once and report it back to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 947) to create a new division in the eastern judicial district of the State of Tennessee was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., certain lands as a city park, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 6272) fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 136) providing for the distribution of Compiled Statutes of the District of Columbia to committees of the Senate and House of Representatives was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the census bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the conference report been submitted?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is in order, I suppose, without a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order, if it is submitted.

Mr. CARTER. I submit the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2179) entitled "An act relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "censuses," at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"Provided, That in taking the census of said classes the inquiries shall be confined to the following four questions, namely: Name, age, sex, and post-office address."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

THOS. H. CARTER,
EUGENE HALE,
S. D. McENERY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

A. J. HOPKINS,
CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
F. M. GRIFFITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the result? Let us have an explanation. We can not tell by the numbers of the amendments.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in respect to the agreement relative to amendment No. 1, relating to the classes of deaf, dumb, and blind, the Senate recedes from its disagreement, subject, however, to an amendment which limits the inquiries to be propounded on the schedule with reference to these classes to four questions—the name, age, sex, and post-office address. This amendment was thought proper, because, if no restraint were fixed by law, this schedule would become one of considerable extent and would lead out to questions as to the degree of afflictions, the degree of defective hearing, the time when the hearing became defective; degrees of defective speech, degrees of blindness, the age at which the affliction commenced, and almost an innumerable list of inquiries, which would probably be propounded unless by law the schedule should be confined to these four elementary and necessary questions.

We think the amendment will result in a concise schedule, at the same time disclosing all the information contemplated by the parties who have so earnestly pressed the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO SAMUEL HAHNEMANN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 3) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

I will say that a joint resolution for this purpose has twice passed the Senate. In the Fifty-fourth Congress one passed both Houses of Congress, but the President at the close of the session had not time or did not sign it. I think it will provoke no discussion whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let us go to the Calendar, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 1481) appropriating money to reimburse Capt. B. Tellefsen was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Calendar number of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Calendar No. 11.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have Calendar No. 10 here, Senate bill 1394, and I also have Calendar No. 10, House bill No. 1. Calendar No. 10 is Senate bill 1394, a bill for the relief of Bvt. Col. Thomas P. O'Reilly. I do not find that on the Calendar, and I do not know how two separate bills on distinct and diverse subjects can have the same number.

Mr. TILLMAN. As there seems to be some hitch in the passage of this measure, and as I gave notice that I would take the floor at the expiration of the morning business to-day, I do not think I ought to be cut out by this manner of carrying on business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the Senator been cut out?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know who brought this bill up.

Mr. COCKRELL. I called for the Calendar. Nothing else was called for.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not hear the Chair announce that morning business was closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The very moment the Senator from South Carolina announces that he is ready to take the floor he will have it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been waiting for an hour or more to unbosom myself to my brethren here, and first one and then another——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am sorry the Senator is so modest that he can not ask to be recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator was so modest that he wanted us to notify him when we wanted him to start.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no. I did not hear the Chair announce that morning business was closed; I did not know it was closed until I saw that bundle of bills drawn out and the rigmarole started that no one seemed to know anything about, not even the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no doubt of the fact that everybody wants the Senator to begin, so that he will get through.

Mr. TILLMAN. Perhaps if the Senator will do me the courtesy to stay and listen to what I have to say he will laugh on the other side of his mouth before he gets through.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 27th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2284) extending the time for the completion of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by an act approved June 3, 1896.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in order to refresh Senators' minds, because I know from my own experience that these things pass from our memories very quickly, I ask to have read Senate bill 2355.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as directed.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, introduced by Mr. SPOONER on the 11th instant, as follows:

That when all insurrection against the sovereignty and authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands, acquired from Spain by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, shall have been completely suppressed by the military and naval forces of the United States, all military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the said islands shall, until otherwise provided by Congress, be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have Senate joint resolution 53 read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE on the 4th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now I should like to have Senate resolution No. 34 read, which I had the honor to introduce myself, and upon which I will speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN December 18, 1899, as follows:

Resolved, First. That, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Second. That under the Constitution of the United States the Federal Government has no power to rule over colonial dependencies, but is restricted in its operations to States as integral parts of the Union and to Territories intended for future States.

Third. That the expansion of our commerce has not been, and can not be, dependent upon the adoption of a policy of imperialism, involving the subjugation and annexation of Asiatic colonies, but would in the end be hindered by such a policy.

Fourth. That we are opposed to the retention of the Philippine Islands by the United States, and that it is our purpose to consent to the independence of the Filipinos as soon as a stable government shall be established by them; and toward the prompt establishment of such government we pledge our friendly assistance.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the subject-matter of the various resolutions which have been read has been discussed very extensively throughout the United States and quite exhaustively in this body. There is a wide difference of opinion in regard to the policy that the United States ought to pursue. It is not a party question, because there are men who are earnest advocates of the policy outlined and followed up to this time by the President who would hate to be considered other than the most loyal Democrats, and there are others belonging to the party of the President—able, influential men in the councils of that party—who are just as pronounced in opposition to his policy as anybody possibly can be.

It is contended by those whom we term imperialists that they are not imperialists; that there is no danger in this policy; that the people of the United States are capable of grappling with and solving any problem of government without regard to the old ideals or principles which have hitherto controlled in our affairs. They say there is nothing to menace the Republic in this matter, and that we will move forward boldly, bravely, seizing the opportunities that have come to us, and that it would be nothing but cowardice to follow any other course.

Very few students of history will deny that we now have strange and unaccountable, almost inexplicable, utterances by men who have been trained to look upon the Declaration of Independence as akin almost to the Sermon on the Mount in its sacred character, in its office of guiding the destinies of this country and of offering hope and inspirations to the downtrodden millions of the earth.

Mr. President, I propose to speak with a great deal of candor in discussing this question, because, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] declared in his remarkable speech the other day, the times call for candor. While I shall hew to the line and let the chips fall where they may, I disclaim in the outset any purpose other than that of discharging my duty as I see and understand it.

Before I begin to discuss the main issue that I shall present to the Senate, I wish to call attention to the propositions laid down in the resolution which I have introduced.

I feel like apologizing to those who have come to regard the Declaration of Independence as an academic utterance, or the principles and motives which prompted that declaration as such, for having introduced a resolution embracing any part of that immortal instrument in it. No doubt there are a great many men in this Chamber and outside of it who have come to regard Jefferson, Washington, Madison, and Adams and the other fathers of the Republic as old fogies, as men who had to deal with conditions which confronted them, and which they solved to their satisfaction, and who in this day and time would be far behind the men of our day and unfit to be leaders.

There are men on this floor who feel that in statecraft they are far superior to Jefferson, and there are men both inside and outside of this Chamber who consider that in directing the affairs of a great government the principles which he laid down should no longer control. We have to-day new doctrines brought forward here and advanced with solemnity and with all the earnestness and ability that men can give to them which even fifteen years ago would have caused this country to be shocked from one end to the other. And yet, Mr. President, we hear nothing in the newspapers except praise for this new evangel. We find the press of the country controlled by the new influences which dominate our affairs, yelping in chorus in favor of these new doctrines, and there is no longer any pretense that the Declaration of Independence is a governing force in our affairs, or that the Constitution itself can apply to all people under our jurisdiction.

The resolution, as I said, embraces a rehearsal of the famous beginning to the Declaration of Independence in regard to the equality of men, the unalienable right to life, liberty, and happiness; that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and so forth. These ideas are stale and outworn, it seems, and I shall not discuss them, except incidentally. I shall illustrate some of my arguments by reference to this immortal declaration, but I will go on to the next proposition, which is that this Government can not hold territories for the purpose of governing them as colonies only, and that there is no power under our Constitution or under our laws to govern people and territory with other purpose than to create States.

That is a legal proposition about which men will differ. Men who are lawyers always differ. It is their business to differ. If all lawyers agreed, there would be no attorney on the other side, and one fee would not be earned.

I lay down this broad proposition, which I will not undertake to argue out from a legal standpoint, but which rests on the basis of common sense, that the United States can not govern any country that does not belong to the United States, and that if we have any territory anywhere above which our flag floats there the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the country go together, and if the flag goes there the Constitution and the principles underlying the Constitution and Declaration of Independence go too. If we surrender these, if we by our action here claim that we have other and further power, then, Mr. President, the beginning of the end has come.

I will print in my remarks, but will not take time to read them, some decisions of the Supreme Court bearing on this question, in which, if language, the strongest, clearest, most emphatic, most undoubted in its meaning can convey any meaning, it is shown that according to the opinion of the Supreme Court the proposition I have laid down is the law of the land and that Congress must carry it out.

Our Supreme Court, the authorized interpreter of our Constitution, has said:

> A power in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories over which they (the Congress) might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form. (Scott vs. Sanford, 19 How., 397.)

In another case that court has said:

> The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union. (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15.)

In still another case it said:

> The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as States upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects. (Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1.)

In still another case it said:

> The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition or wherever he may be within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection. (United States vs. Moore, 3 Cranch, 159.)

And in defining the rights of the inhabitants of Territories it said:

> The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national. (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15. See also Mormon Church vs. United States, 136 U. S. Rep., 1.)

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States."

Chief Justice Marshall, for the entire court, defined the term "United States" as follows:

> Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania. (Loughborough vs. Blake, 5 Wheaton, 317.)

Judge Cooley, whose commentaries are universally accepted as conclusive interpretations of our constitutional law, summarizes the doctrine as follows:

> And when territory is acquired the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but also because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its own imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions. (Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, 179.)

Having given these opinions of our court of last resort, I will leave this part of my subject and pass on.

The next proposition which is involved in the resolution is that our commerce does not depend upon the acquisition of Asiatic territory, and I will only draw the attention of Senators, without going into statistics, to the fact, which can not be disputed, that of the exports of the American people at least 90 per cent at this time go to Europe. Our commerce in the Pacific is comparatively small.

While visions of greatness, of empire, and of untold wealth which is to flow therefrom, which so dazzled the eyes of the Senator from Indiana the other day, are in the air, and every man imagines that a new Aladdin's palace is going to spring up in that quarter of the globe which we are to march forward to and occupy, I say to him that if I know anything about it—and I at least am entitled to my opinion, if nothing else—the nations of Europe, which has a comparatively small area and is densely populated, will call on us in future as they have in the past for our surplus agricultural products to feed their teeming millions, and that our manufactured products, if we shall become possessors of this eastern empire, will only go there if we can sell those people the best goods at the lowest price. We need not establish in that territory a despotism which will bar out by our tariff laws the products of other nationalities, and we are reaching after a shadow while we can get the substance without any army, without any risk to our Constitution, without straining our power as a Congress, without going contrary to or being false to the traditions of our people; and I say that the flag is not necessary to be backed by bayonets in order to sell our calico and our other manufactures in that market.

Our trade with the Philippine Islands, which is the immediate subject of discussion, is comparatively trifling. The trade of the whole Philippine Islands is so small that it can cut no figure in this discussion. I think the exports and imports of the whole islands amount to something less than $30,000,000.

Of course, we are told that with the enlivening influences of American genius and money, and with the granting of franchises to certain people to exploit and to develop those islands, that commerce will double and treble and quintuple, and all that. It may be that it will; I presume it could. But if it does, it will be at the expense of one of two great principles:

We must ignore the rights and interests of the people of those islands and allow capitalists to exploit those islands as England has done in India—in other words, rob the people; or we shall have a part of the territory of the United States, a people, a land, under our flag against which we must discriminate by having their products barred from our shores while we force on them our manufactures. Either we must admit them, if the Supreme Court's dictum is right, and have their products come here in competition with ours, or we must exclude them against all the principles and opinions of that court hitherto. If that be true, if we come to that, if we can discriminate against the Philippines after they have been annexed lawfully or unlawfully and become a part of the territory of this country, then we can discriminate as between Massachusetts and South Carolina or any other part of our domain if Congress says so.

But, Mr. President, to come down to the milk in the cocoanut, the real subject of my speech, have we got a legal title to the Philippines? Upon the decision of that question in the minds of the American people and of Congress will turn the question as to what action we shall take.

Now, what are the facts? I shall trespass upon the time of the Senate to rehearse in a general way some undisputed facts proven by the documents sent to us by the President of the United States and from General Otis's reports, and I shall do that in the briefest possible way.

Nobody denies that the Filipinos commenced their insurrection against Spain in 1896; that they were at war with Spain, and that after successes more or less indicative of Spain's inability to conquer the islands and hold them, or rather retain them, Spain made a treaty December, 1897, with Aguinaldo and his lieutenants by which certain reforms were to be granted, and these lieutenants and chiefs were to leave the islands and receive $400,000 as compensation for deserting or leaving their own property. The people of the Philippine Islands did not cease their war, however. Aguinaldo departed, the $400,000 was paid, but the insurrection went on, and nobody denies it, because our consul said so. It went on because Spain, ever treacherous, failed to grant the reforms promised.

Dewey went to Manila the 1st of May, 1898. Fifteen days later Aguinaldo followed, brought there in an American ship; he landed; issued his proclamation; Dewey gave him arms, rifles, and artillery with which to fight the Spaniards. He acted in the capacity of an ally, under the direction of Dewey, and with his full knowledge and consent, and Dewey encouraged it. He moved forward, capturing Spanish stronghold after stronghold until he had cooped up the last Spaniard in Luzon in the city of Manila. He did that before any of our troops arrived there.

In the meantime he had issued his proclamation calling upon the Filipinos to elect delegates to a congress. That congress assembled; a provisional government was formed, of which he was given the dictatorship. His army participated in the siege of Manila, after General Merritt had reached there with some American soldiers. When the city surrendered he occupied part of it with his troops, and was recognized by Merritt as an ally.

The Spaniards later on abandoned the only other place they had in the islands, Iloilo, and it was occupied by the Filipinos. They had a little garrison at Zamboanga and one or two other small towns on the seacoast. The Filipino republic established its authority over every foot of the territory in those islands, with the exception of the Sulu group and of the four towns I have mentioned. Its authority was recognized everywhere as supreme. Everywhere law and order prevailed, according to the statement of our naval officers who went on a tour of inspection through Luzon; and the Filipino government was as firmly established in the control of those islands as though there were no Spaniards on them. There was no looting and no fighting. There is no doubt that Aguinaldo could have captured Manila, if Dewey had permitted it, before Merritt got there.

Well, what are the legal points involved here? That Spain's colonists revolted against her before we declared war; that they drove her troops into Manila and established a government of their own, and all before the United States had even thought of claiming the islands; because if we read the report of General Otis, we will find that those people had been encouraged to hope for self-government. They had been assured that the Government of the United States had no selfish or sinister purposes; that the war had been begun because we loved humanity and liberty; and the only friction that arose between Aguinaldo and General Merritt's successor, General Otis, was from the suspicion Aguinaldo had that we might leave the islands in the possession of Spain when the treaty was made, and thereby they would be endangered by the possession of fortified places which were held by Americans and surrendered when the Spaniards returned to try and reestablish their authority.

I will read here a very brief extract from the first letter that General Otis ever wrote to Aguinaldo. The city of Manila surrendered on the 12th of August. Merritt was relieved in a very few days later, and Otis took his place. He found an unanswered letter from Aguinaldo making some inquiries as to the purpose of this Government and protesting against yielding up positions which his army held. After Otis had had time to familiarize himself with the conditions, I will read what he said in a letter dated September 8. Now, Senators, listen here:

> Permit me, General, to assure you that I fully appreciate the difficulties under which you labor in your endeavors to carry out the desires and demands of your people. As I have already expressed myself in former communications, I am fully convinced of your wish to maintain harmonious relations with the United States forces and government of Manila, and that you deplore, with me, any proceeding which may disturb that harmony and friendly feeling. I have been fully aware that all unpleasant incidents which have occurred, and to which I alluded in my former letter, were due entirely to irresponsible and unwarranted action of subordinates, and I am constantly called upon to correct misconceptions entertained by my troops and to punish offenses which they have wantonly committed.

I made a mistake in getting hold of the wrong letter. That is one I intended to read later on, but it shows that Otis felt that Aguinaldo at heart had no purpose to bring about any conflict and that he was not complaining captiously.

Here is the letter I intended to read in regard to Otis's pledges or promises to this man in his first official communication, and remember, Senators, that Otis was there as the Governor-General of the United States, our representative with full authority to do as he pleased or as in his judgment was best for this country. Here is what he wrote to this man September 8, 1898:

> Rather than see the ships of the Navy of the United States controlling the navigable waters of these islands and its Army devastating their territory, I would greatly prefer to advise my Government that there is no longer need to send more of its troops to this section of the country and that those whom it holds waiting on its Pacific slope can be remanded to their homes or employed elsewhere, as it may determine.

People will say that Otis had no authority to bind the United States. Mind you, he had disclaimed any authority, but here he was expressing that feeling as one which actuated him and the American people. He did not know the President was going to change his mind.

But I will go back without further touching the point as to our bad faith. Without adding to the mountain of evidence produced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] in his speech on that subject, without appealing to the equities in this case, we will come down to the legal principles of international law.

First, the Filipinos had revolted and were fighting for their liberty before we declared war with Spain. Second, they had conquered the archipelago and had possession of it, and Aguinaldo's authority was recognized throughout it except in the Mohammedan islands in the south. I might—but I will come to that later if I do not forget it; I believe I will do it now for fear I may forget it—I might ask the question why, in dealing with those people, we selected the barbarians, the savages, the Mohammedans, who practice polygamy, to treat with pacifically and to bribe or buy their allegiance, and took the Christians, who acknowledge the same God as we do and the same Christ, as the targets for our bullets, under the plea that they must submit abjectly and absolutely to whatever we told them?

If, as some people proclaim, and I have grown a little nauseated at the continued reiteration of the sentiment, we have gone into a partnership with God in this business, why did we not recognize those who acknowledge His Son and treat with them as one Christian people should treat with another rather than present to their bosoms our bayonets and say, "Get on your knees; surrender your liberties, your lives, your property, and all you hold dear to the dictation of our people without any guaranties, or we will shoot you to death?"

Aguinaldo sent his representative, Agoncillo, here in October, 1898, I think it was. He begged and pleaded with the President for some recognition, some indication as to what the purpose of the President was. Aguinaldo himself, being the representative of his people and having their confidence and love, their dictator, if you please, with absolute autocratic power, as this correspondence shows, was forced to do certain things and to maintain an attitude of resistance, because his own soldiers would have shot him to death if they had felt that he was willing to have the authority of the United States substituted for that of Spain. No autonomy or recognition of the aspirations of the Filipinos for self-government was allowed.

But to get back to the proposition; these people had conquered their liberties from Spain before we conquered Manila. We helped them. Well and good. That did not give us any more title to their property or to their land than it did the French when they helped us in the Revolutionary war. The legal status was that the Filipinos had a government of their own, and we had only Manila. The treaty of peace came; we made a demand.

The President went West; he held his ear to the ground, so the newspapers stated; he was applauded everywhere on his way in Iowa, Illinois, and other Western States when he spoke about the flag having been planted on lands watered by the blood of our soldiers and asked who would "tear it down." He thought he was doing a popular thing. I can not believe he thought he was doing a right thing. So he demanded that the islands should be bought, giving $20,000,000 for something that Spain did not possess, which Spain could not deliver. Spain's right, title, and interest, whatever that was, passed to us. That is the legal status.

Now, what is the legal result? Did we get any title? I say no. I could not get any property in this city or in any other place on such conditions. I have to go into court; I must have delivery follow the deed; I have got to prove that the property belonged to the man who sold it. We can not prove Spain's title. We therefore simply bought what Spain did not have—the legal title to the Philippine Islands—and we have conquered those islands at the point of the bayonet. So whatever title we now possess rests upon conquest and conquest only. Here is an undoubted authority as to the law of the case.

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, volume 1, page 178, referring to territories added or acquired, said:

> Full sovereignty can not be held to have passed by the mere words of the treaty without actual delivery. To complete the right of property, the right to the thing and the possession of the thing must be united. This is a necessary principle in the law of property in all systems of jurisprudence. * * *
> This general law of property applies to the right of territory no less than to other rights. The practice of nations has been conformable to this principle, and the conventional law of nations is full of instances of this kind.

In a treatise on international law by Sir Shurston Baker, just published, at Boston, by Little, Brown & Co., at page 61, that author says:

> In modern times sales and transfers of national territory to another power can only be made by treaty or some solemn act of the sovereign authority of the State. And such transfers of territory do not include the allegiance of its inhabitants without their consent, express or implied.

At page 355 the same author says:

> The rule of public law with respect to the allegiance of the inhabitants of a conquered territory is, therefore, no longer to be interpreted as meaning that it is absolutely and unconditionally acquired by conquest, or transferred and handed over by treaty as a thing assignable by contract and without the assent of the subject.
> On the contrary, the express or implied assent of the subject is now regarded as essential to a complete new allegiance.

We have only got the color of a claim, but no title. Are those people, then, rebels? I have not noticed that word being used so much in the dispatches recently. They are now called insurgents. But if they were insurgents, against whom did they rise? Spain. They never rose against us. We began war on them by shooting down one of their men. The President issued his proclamation in December, six weeks before the ratification of the treaty of peace, proclaiming his purpose to annex and control those islands absolutely. He had no law for it; he had no authority for it, for the treaty had not been ratified.

Congress was in session and had not told him to do it; yet men contend that we have a perfect title to the Philippines; that there is nothing in the contention of the Filipinos that they had won their liberty and the control of their country with their arms. It is contended that we are rightfully putting our authority in force and extending it over those people and those islands because the United States does not treat with rebels. It only buys allegiance from savages and polygamous Mohammedans!! God save the mark!

Mr. President, suppose we acknowledge, for the sake of argument, that we own the Philippine Islands; that our title is good; that whether it is good or not, we have made it good by force; that we have a de facto if not a de jure title that nobody disputes except the guerrillas who are now out there killing an occasional American soldier and still struggling for liberty.

Senators, do not forget, when you come to consider this question and determine it, that we brought Spain, the mistress of those people, to her knees in sixty days after the declaration of war with the use of only 15,000 of our troops and of our Navy, but that this Filipino war has cost us the lives of 2,000 American soldiers, $200,000,000 in money, and the use of 60,000 men for over a year, and those men who are fighting there for the love of liberty, who have forced us to display this power and spend this money, have proved that they are worthy of liberty, whether we give it to them or not.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] expressed some very queer ideas about liberty. He said that self-government is a sacred thing. I shall not quote his exact language now, because I am going to read just what he said directly. I have some argument here, put into words which I have selected, where I have said exactly what I want to say, no more and no less, and I will come to it directly.

I wish to allude in passing to the proposition that self-government, as understood by historians and all the peoples who have fought for that inestimable blessing, is a government of your own people—not a republic, not a government by ballot, not any special form of government, but a government of Germans by Germans, of Frenchmen by Frenchmen, and so on. That is self-government. A people who want to have an empire or a dictatorship or a limited monarchy or an autocracy have a perfect right to live under it. It does not gall like a foreign yoke.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that the Government of the Czar of Russia is self-government?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is Russian Government.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But is it self-government?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is self-government to the extent that it is satisfactory to the Russian people. No one else has any right to complain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I fear the Senator has misread my speech. The Senator has said that his interpretation of self-government was a government which was by——

Mr. TILLMAN. By one's own people, one's own kindred.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is the Government of the Czar of Russia self-government?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not, according to our standard.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. And there is no self-government in Europe, according to our standard, outside of England. France has not got it, although she has the form of a republic, because she is really an oligarchy. Switzerland has it. I beg pardon; I should have said that Switzerland and England were the only two self-governing nations in Europe, judged by our standards.

I want to direct the Senator's attention to one thing in his speech. He said that Aguinaldo was capable and honorable, and I do not know how many other good adjectives the Senator applied to him, but he concluded by saying he was a Malay Sylla, not a Filipino Washington. I will quote him accurately when I come to make up the record, but I now direct his attention, and the attention of the country and of the Senate to the fact that the scheme of government which the Senator would have set up and which he stands for, which the Senator from Wisconsin stands for, and which the President of the United Stands for—unless you all repudiate it—is one which Aguinaldo could have carried out to perfection, because he has in his own person the very attributes of the kind of autocrat that you would put there under our flag.

Here is the description given by the Senator from Indiana of the Filipino leader:

> Aguinaldo is the highest type of subtlety and the most constructive mind that race has yet produced. Aguinaldo is a clever, popular leader, able, brave, resourceful, cunning, ambitious, unscrupulous, and masterful. He is full of decision, initiative, and authority, and had the confidence of the masses. He is a natural dictator. His ideas of government are absolute orders, implicit obedience, or immediate death. He understands the character of his countrymen. He is a Malay Sylla; not a Filipino Washington.

I will show later how well he would have fitted in the Senator's scheme when I come to that.

Mr. President, for sake of comparison, look at Mexico. For fifty years she was the laughingstock of the nations because of the inability of her people to realize what it was to elect anybody to govern them. One military chieftain after another seized upon power, revolution followed revolution, until, under the benign rule of a dictator—Diaz—peace, good order, prosperity, happiness have come to those people, because he possessed in himself the capacity to restore law and order and to maintain a government which was equal in its application to all and free from tyranny and just what was needed. He alone has given his people what Aguinaldo would, I believe, give to the Filipinos if he had an opportunity.

Therefore I deny, I repudiate—and I love our institutions as much as any man—the pretension that we must have a Procrustean bed and cause all people to lie on it, whether they are long enough to fill it out or too long and have to be cut off. And with this stench of dirty, low, roguish politics we have in two of our largest American cities—one under Democratic and the other under Republican rule—I want to ask the Senator if we are in any condition to stand up and boast of our institutions as alone worthy of imitation and that they must be adopted by everybody who comes in contact with us?

But we had a great dream of profit, of wealth, and of the inestimable blessings which would flow to the American people by the possession of the Philippine Archipelago as the doorway to the East. If you take the money we have spent and put it out at interest, it would yield a far larger sum than any possible profit that will ever come to us as a people.

Some franchises may be granted to sugar planters, tobacco growers, cotton growers, or rice growers; some contract laborers may be imported from China who will work—for the Senator from Indiana says the Filipinos will not—who will be driven by the whip, as the slaves were in the South before the war, and as they are now driven in Hawaii, to develop the rich lands of which we have heard; and there may be teeming imports coming to our country from such labor thus employed and protected by our bayonets, and the few will reap the benefits. Those bayonets must be supported by taxation, and the taxation will be paid by the laboring classes of the United States, the common, everyday citizens. The benefit of the wealth will flow into the coffers of the capitalists or corporations who go out there and invest their capital, but the everyday taxpayer of the United States will never see one dollar's profit from the Philippine Islands.

Then their products will come in competition with the products of the Southern people—cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar. They must be admitted free or we shall establish a barrier between two parts of the United States. If they are admitted free, those States where those products are raised are to suffer and be ruined for the benefit of the capitalists who will import those products from their plantations in the Philippine Islands. We must compete with "pauper labor" held down by bayonets.

There is one other aspect of this question which must appeal to any thinking man, and that is the question as to whether we can maintain the Monroe doctrine in the Western Hemisphere, warn off trespassers and fight and beat off any nationality in Europe, or any combination of nationalities, who dare to come on this continent and establish any of their despotisms or governments, whatever they may be. Can we maintain that doctrine after we have invaded the other hemisphere, have occupied territory, and stand ready to participate—for it is no use to deny it, it is the purpose fully outlined in this Chamber in more ways than one and at more times than one—to participate in the partition of China whenever that comes.

We have become a "world power." We are to create a big navy and maintain a large army. I am in favor of navy enough to warn all people off from this continent and keep them off of it; but if we are going to undertake to warn others to keep outside of our preserves and then claim the right to invade their area of jurisdiction and territory, the beginning of the wars in which we shall be involved and the cost of those wars in life and treasure, the probable consequences of surrendering a tenable position for one full of danger and always inviting attack, should at least give Senators pause and make them stop and think and consider calmly whether the game is worth the candle; whether we have a title to the Philippines; whether we have made a mistake, and if so, what we ought to do.

Mr. President, I now approach a phase of this question which is very unpleasant because it deals with the personality of men, and I would not willingly wound the sensibilities of any of those who, like myself, are charged here with governmental responsibility. Those of us who from the very beginning have opposed this policy have appealed and argued for what we conceived to be right; that our Government should pursue the only course which to our minds was honorable and just, have been met with accusations of treason, have been charged with lack of patriotism, and the Senator from Indiana has not even hesitated to tell us to our faces that we are responsible for the war and its consequences. His ignorance of the facts may explain his effrontery and in part excuse it. He said:

> American opposition to the war has been the chief factor in prolonging it. Had Aguinaldo not understood that in America, even in the American Congress, even here in the Senate, he and his cause were supported; had he not known that it was proclaimed on the stump and in the press of a faction in the United States that every shot that his misguided followers fired into the breasts of American soldiers was like the volleys fired by Washington's men against the soldiers of King George, his insurrection would have dissolved before it entirely crystallized.

Then again he said:

> I have stood on the firing line and beheld our dead soldiers, their faces turned to the pitiless Southern sky, and in sorrow rather than anger I say to those whose voices in America have cheered those misguided natives on to shoot our soldiers down that the blood of those dead and wounded boys of ours is on their hands, and the flood of all the years can never wash that stain away.

Mr. President, if Senators on this floor and patriotic Americans throughout the country—thousands of them belonging to the party which elected Mr. McKinley President—have felt it their duty to protest against the inhuman and dishonorable conduct of our Government, if they have believed that the Stars and Stripes were being disgraced and that the United States was waging a war of conquest upon a liberty-loving people, I ask that Senator in God's name would he have us remain silent? He has his opinions on this subject. So have we. He has a right to speak those opinions without question anywhere. So have we. Are Senators and citizens to be afraid to speak the truth? Must we close our eyes and shut our mouths to all the grave dangers to our institutions by reason of this policy? Must we be accused of disloyalty to the flag because we declare our belief that in prosecuting this war it is in disloyalty to the Declaration of Independence? I repel with scorn the charge coming from any source whatever that I am not as loyal to the flag as any man on this floor, and if it is sought to locate the responsibility for the blood that has been spilled I am ready in this presence to speak what I believe and to declare the truth as I see it.

There are three classes of men in the United States Congress, those who are honest and independent, those who are corrupt, and those who are merely weak. When I first came to this Capitol I thought there were as many of the one class as of the other. A closer view and fuller acquaintance has taught me that the really corrupt men are few in number, but the weak ones are in a large majority. I speak now from personal knowledge and inquiry and investigation. I do not hesitate to assert that when it was first proposed to annex the Philippines a majority in both Houses of Congress were opposed to it.

After the President went on his Western tour his own misgivings and doubts were pushed aside, and he felt that he was doing a popular thing in demanding that Spain should cede us the islands. Then, by the instrumentalities that are so well understood in this Chamber and in the other Chamber, in the use of which he is not alone, because they were alike characteristic of his predecessor, Executive influence was brought to bear; the party whip was cracked; the men who thought the Filipinos ought to be let alone, we exercising some kind of a protectorate over them and getting such advantages as we might need in our business as a naval power and as a commercial power—those men, I say, surrendered their independence as Senators and the treaty was ratified.

Party was everything; principle was nothing; everything for Republicanism, nothing for America. There were some honorable exceptions among the adherents of the President; and, Mr. President, if there are any men in this Chamber whom I honor, it is those Republicans here who, in spite of all the threatening lightnings that were flashing around their heads, stood steadfast as the advocates of that policy which was alone honorable, patriotic, and in accordance with fairness and justice. But with those Republicans all lined up and some Democrats who, from purity of motive or from honesty of belief, had joined with them, there was still lacking the two-thirds vote necessary; the President's hands were tied unless the treaty was ratified, and his proclamation of annexation would have no authority and would have died. Where did he get the votes, and how?

If you want my opinion as to whose hands are red with the blood of American soldiers, and of tens of thousands of Filipinos—men, women, and children—who have been slaughtered like cattle, look around and call to mind the men who made those strong and eloquent pleas, those earnest protests on this floor in opposition to the treaty, and even gave personal pledges to their fellows as to how they would vote. Those are the men who, whether from corruption or from weakness or both, gave the President the legal excuse which he needed to prosecute the war.

I impugn no man's motives; I have no proofs of corruption and I want none; but whether the President be most to blame or whether the crime rests on his dupes and subservient party dependents I say, with all the emphasis of my nature, that I and none of those who voted against the treaty are responsible for the spilling of one drop of this innocent blood that has been shed, and I will not endure patiently and without resentment any such accusation. With the ratification of the treaty Spain's rights, whatever they were, passed to us, and as the President had determined six weeks before that the islands should be brought under the rule of our Government and issued his proclamation to that effect without any authority of law, the impartial historian will declare that he is primarily responsible for the war, responsible for the loss of the lives of our soldiers, responsible for the inhuman and devastating conflict that has followed, and that he obtained the permission which was necessary through the cowardice, venality, or weakness of men in this Chamber.

Therefore I say to the Senator from Indiana:

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

I stand by the record as it has been presented in this Senate, the documents sent us by the President himself, and the report of General Otis. The record of speeches made in this Chamber will sustain every assertion I have made, and the American people can not be deceived any longer unless they want to be.

I have left to the last the discussion of that phase of this subject which is most important and vital—the race question. It is well understood that the people who inhabit the Philippines belong to what we call the colored races, and the most perplexing and disturbing factor in the whole question arises from this fact. The number of these people is variously estimated at from six to ten millions, and the Senator from Indiana, who has spent some time in personal investigation, asserts in the most positive manner that they are unfit for self-government, and he gives us some very strange and unaccountable reasons as to why this is so. I say unaccountable because the Senator comes from a State and belongs to a party that in the very recent past held very different views in regard to the capabilities of the blackest and lowest type of the colored peoples.

I pause here to state the necessity I feel for speaking with absolute candor and frankness. It is not pleasant to open old wounds or to stir the embers—I prefer to think that they are ashes—of those dead passions which brought on our great civil conflict, but, Mr. President, coming as I do from a State where this race question has been the cause of untold misery and woe, and where, for thirty-two years, it has been and is now the paramount issue; remembering the wrongs that have been heaped upon my people, the sons of Revolutionary sires, who suffered more and endured more in the cause of liberty in that struggle than those of any other State and feeling the race question in its broadest sense, as we know it, may be likened to the "worm that dieth not," that it is a new "irrepressible conflict" that can not be shunned, but presents ever growing and ever formidable dangers—I must speak my thoughts though I die for it.

I will not join the Senator from Alabama, who is not in the Chamber, in the assertions made in his speech on the Pritchard resolution:

> I was a soldier of the Confederacy, and, while I have always regretted the necessity that put me under arms in open hostility to the flag of our common country, I feel, as every Confederate soldier feels, that it is a peculiar honor that we were the only white men ever called upon as soldiers to defend the white race against a fanatical attack of so-called reformers and the deliberate organization of ambitious politicians, who forced us into war by their cruel design to put negro slaves on a political and social footing of equality with us.

I do not believe any such thing. The war had no such origin. The condition in regard to slavery and the ceaseless agitation had embittered the South against the North and the North against the South. Secession and belief in States' rights, for which the South has always contended, precipitated the conflict. The North fought to preserve the Union and to free the slaves, and the South fought for self-government and the inherited belief in the justice of holding slaves as property. The Declaration of Independence was the slogan of both sections. The North contended that the Declaration embraced the negroes, while the South, remembering that Jefferson had been a slaveholder, contended that it did not. I was only a boy of thirteen when the great struggle began; but who can forget, even though a child, the angry outbursts, the battle cries that had led up to the bloody contest? Amid the storm of passion, who was the man, the embodiment of all that was best and noblest in Northern civilization, and even in American civilization, who stood as the great apostle of liberty? Whose words of fervid eloquence marshaled the Northern hosts? Whose high moral purpose, whose grandeur of character and greatness of soul, sustained those hosts in adversity and defeat? Who stood like a colossus towering above the smaller, meaner men who surrounded him, and who must ever stand above them, commanding the admiration and love of all true men everywhere? Who? Abraham Lincoln; and I from South Carolina tell you so and feel honored in doing it.

Whatever motives may be attributed to others, whatever of selfishness or ambition that entered into the calculations of others, I here declare it is my belief that he never had a thought in connection with the whole subject nor uttered a word that did not have its inspiration in the purest patriotism and the noblest aspiration for humanity. He did not consider the Declaration of Independence an academic question. It was to him a religion.

Now, after all the bloodshed, what have we as a people gained? What has the conflict left to us? Although this city is filled with monuments erected to the brave men who bared their bosoms to the storms of shot and shell from Confederate rifles and cannon, although the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution were declared to be necessary to secure the fruits of this victory for liberty in the Union, and were said to be the fruit, the gathering in, the perfecting and solidifying of the structure of liberty; although no honest man will deny that the words of Webster, "Liberty and union, one and inseparable, now and forever," had been the inspiration which filled the Northern armies and under Lincoln's leadership won the fight; although we now have a nation whose States are cemented together with blood, it is a Union only; the spirit, the vitalizing essence, love of liberty, appears to have died and little remains of Webster's and Lincoln's ideas.

We have come, within forty years from the beginning of that great struggle, to have a leading Senator on the floor of this Chamber, a man who stands high in the councils of the dominant party—the party of Lincoln, of Sumner, of Phillips, of Seward—declare that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of some of the governed." Another Senator, he from Indiana, whose brilliant speech has been heralded by the imperialist press as the slogan of twentieth-century Republicanism, makes this declaration:

> Let men beware how they employ the term "self-government." It is a sacred term. It is the watchword at the door of the inner temple of liberty, for liberty does not always mean self-government. Self-government is a method of liberty—the highest, simplest, best—and it is acquired only after centuries of study and struggle and experiment and instruction and all the elements of the progress of man. Self-government is no base and common thing, to be bestowed on the merely audacious. It is the degree which crowns the graduate of liberty, not the name of liberty's infant class who have not yet mastered the alphabet of freedom.

Ah, Mr. President, has it come to this? If we attacked the Filipino leaders and their followers, those men of affairs, men so strong in the faith of the right of men to govern themselves after our great example that, although illy armed and without artillery, it has required 60,000 American troops over a year to drive them from the field, and even yet they have not surrendered, but have adopted a guerrilla warfare—if these are not fit for self-government under our kindly tutelage, let me ask of those Republicans here who in part are responsible for it, and who were and are now in absolute sympathy with it, how dared they give the control of the Southern States into the hands of negroes as being fit not only to govern themselves but also to govern white men? How dared you do it? If the Filipinos are children, what were and are the ex-slaves of the South? How dared Republicans appeal to the Northern masses to compel the South to grant the negroes a free vote and a fair count when it involved negro rule pure and simple?

One Sunday morning, while stopping over in Indianapolis, the beautiful capital of the Senator's State, I walked out to take some exercise, and had only gone a little distance from the hotel when I came on a square which the street entered at the corner, and in the center of it is one of the most artistic and beautiful structures in stone I have ever seen—the State's monument to its dead soldiers, costing, I am told, something in the neighborhood of a million dollars. I approached and read on one side, chiseled into the stone, this legend:

TO INDIANA'S SILENT VICTORS, WAR FOR THE UNION, 1861–1865.

129 regiments of volunteer infantry	175,776
14 regiments of volunteer cavalry	21,605
27 regiments of volunteer artillery	10,986
Indiana volunteers in the Navy	2,130
Total Indiana volunteers engaged in battle	210,497
Killed and died:
Commissioned officers	632
Noncommissioned officers and enlisted men	23,784
Total killed and died	24,416

For the purpose of comparison I will give the figures from my own State of South Carolina: Total number of officers and men who volunteered, 71,083; died in battle, died from disease, died in prison—total, 15,495.

I took the trouble to compare the patriotism of the two sides to the quarrel as evinced by their willingness to die for what they fought. The voting population of South Carolina in 1860 was 60,000—that is, those 21 years of age and white. We put into the field 11,000 more men than we had voters. Indiana's voting population was 300,000 in round numbers. Ninety thousand of her voters or their substitutes did not volunteer. They were not needed, I suppose. Now for the deaths. The percentage of deaths in Indiana was 11½; in South Carolina, 22, nearly double.

I will make no comment on this, Mr. President, other than to remark that I believe the men on both sides thought they were right, and the South Carolinians, true to their State motto, "Animis opibusque parati," "Ready with our lives and fortunes," died for their convictions. No man can do more, and I pity the narrow soul who would charge them with being rebels or traitors. As did South Carolina and Indiana, so did they all. The embattled South met the embattled North, and the issue was thought to be settled.

That issue, as I have stated, was whether all men are created free and equal, including the negro. But for that there would have been no secession; but for that there would have been no war. Therefore, while I have acknowledged in the fullest sense that the Union sentiment caused the Northern people to pour out their blood like water to maintain it, do not forget that the issue was the equality of man and liberty in the Union. Is the question settled? Did the 24,000 men from Indiana who offered up their lives for the Union and liberty believe that in thirty-five years the party and the men of the party whose principles they died for would come back to believe with Stephen A. Douglas that the "Declaration of Independence was intended only for white men?"

Did they believe that Lincoln's famous utterance, "The Union can not exist half slave and half free," would be forgotten, and that we would have Senators here contending for the right of Congress to govern indefinitely in absolutism 10,000,000 people under a form of government that is to be "simple and strong," a government of force resting on principles and ideas entirely foreign to those for which Lincoln died? Were the fruits of the war mere Sodom apples, to be turned to ashes on our lips within the generation of the men who fought in that struggle—men who were as earnest, honest, and patriotic in sustaining the Government as any men ever were? Have we got Sodom apples as the fruit of that great contest?

Are the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to be nullified in their essence because they have failed of their purposes in the South? Are they for home use only? Is the flag to become again a "flaunting lie" and float over a military despotism first in the Philippines and later at home? Was the memorable conflict between slavery and freedom useless? Have we gained nothing? Is the commercial greed which dominates in our councils and coerces the President to do his bloody and horrible work to make of the Constitution a new "league with death and a covenant with hell" in the interest of oppression akin to slavery? In order to do all these things must we "camp outside the Constitution" and give the old interpretation of the Southern slaveholders to the Declaration of Independence, and nullify all precedents and decisions of our Supreme Court? Did this nation offer up of its best and bravest upon the altar of liberty the blood of seven hundred thousand men and spend and destroy five billions of treasure that we might have a "government of the people, by the people, for the people," to find that in the brief span of one man's life the sacrifice was vain, the civil war a mistake, and that the colored race has no rights we are bound to respect at home or abroad?

Says the Book, "O ye hypocrites, ye hypocrites!"

Hitherto the South has enjoyed a monopoly in and the odium of shooting and hanging men of the colored race. Have the Northern people grown envious and do they seek to emulate our example? The South has had no choice, and much of the blood of negroes shed by white men is the direct result of the attempt to place that race in control of our Southern States. The irrepressible conflict between liberty and slavery destroyed slavery, but it has left to the South an irrepressible conflict between intelligence and ignorance, between vice and virtue, between barbarism and civilization. We inherited our race problem. You are going out wantonly in search of yours and of the nation's. The sins of our fathers are being visited on the children to the third and fourth generation. The ill consequences of having been bred in an atmosphere of slavery clings to us like the shirt of Nessus in our attempt to throw off the yoke and go forward with progress. But have we not enough of debased and ignoble people in our midst that we should seek by conquest, without any right other than a shadowy one, to incorporate 10,000,000 more colored peoples?

If the North is jealous of the South's "bad eminence" in the murder of colored people, is it not strange, is is not passing strange that almost the only protest against this infamous policy of the President comes from men from the South who are representatives of their States in this Chamber? We know whereof we speak. We are in contact with the race question at close quarters and have been and will have to continue to be. You know not what you do.

We are tied to the "body of death," represented by the presence in our midst of a debased and ignorant race. We are doing the best we can. Can we incorporate a larger number without increasing the danger to our institutions, especially when it is boldly asserted they are not fit for self-government? Is there any reason either in policy or in morals why the already hard task and hopeless future of the blacks of the South, the burdens under which they bend, should be increased by having the "sullen, silent peoples" of the East brought into direct competition with them in the cultivation of cotton, rice, and other subtropical products? Do the imperialists worship at no shrine except that of Mammon?

I mean you men who believe in this new policy. Is the dream of empire in the East and of the wealth that is to flow into our coffers therefrom to drive the nation onward in its downward course, unchecked by any memories of the past, without any regard for the rights and interests of our own people, black or white?

In the rice and sugar industries in Louisiana and South Carolina the labor, which represents three-fourths of the cost, is black, and it is these men who will suffer most.

The Senator from Indiana would have the subjugation of the Filipinos thoroughly performed. His heart is hard as flint, although his face is as tender as that of a smiling girl. Personally I know he is a genial and pleasant gentleman, a man whom I like, and he comes from a State where there are such monuments to the dead who offered up their lives for liberty as should be an inspiration for the love of liberty, and I say it is astounding, Mr. President, that a man coming from such a State should dare get up here and offer such a scheme of government for any people anywhere under the Stars and Stripes as he did.

I beg you to remember that he did not trust that marvelous memory of his, because we all know, at least those of us who have made speeches—and we sometimes talk ourselves—that those flowing periods and those beautiful sentences and that rhetorical beauty and finish and glitter did not come from any well into which he can dip a bucket and draw it out at will. [Laughter.]

Listen to the programme to be followed. He read it, mind you, showing that he either had not had time to commit it to memory or he wanted to be exactly sure of every word. Announcing, as he did, that he was doing it at the request of men at both ends of this Capitol and leading Republicans everywhere, knowing that the papers had stated that he had conferred with the President time and again, I say his theory or his plan of government stands and will continue to stand as that which the Republican party proposes for the government of the Philippines.

I say, further, that while he was candid enough to throw off all disguise, having been a baby or having been born during the war, and remembering nothing about it except a vague and indefinite idea of glory, never having been through it, even in part (although I was not in the army, I know what there was in my country in the way of suffering and tears and blood), he, I say, came here at the end of the nineteenth century, when we are blossoming, so to speak, for a new fruitage; and what is it that he offers us in the way of government? Listen. I can not conceive that any of you caught the full import unless you have studied it:

> And so our Government must be simple and strong. Simple and strong! The meaning of those two words must be written in every line of Philippine legislation, realized in every act of Philippine administration. A Philippine office in our Department of State; an American governor-general in Manila, with power to meet daily emergencies; possibly an advisory council with no power except that of discussing measures with the governor-general, which council would be the germ for future legislatures, a school in practical Government; American lieutenant-governors in each province, with a like council about him; if possible, an American resident in each district and a like council grouped about him; frequent and unannounced visits of provincial governors to the districts of their province; periodical reports to the governor-general; an American board of visitation to make semiannual trips to the archipelago without power of suggestion or interference to officials or people, but only to report and recommend to the Philippine office of our State Department; a Philippine civil service, with promotion for efficiency; the abolition of duties on exports from the Philippines; the establishment of import duties on a revenue basis, with such discrimination in favor of American imports as will prevent the cheaper goods of other nations from destroying American trade; a complete reform of local taxation on a just and scientific basis, beginning with the establishment of a tax on land according to its assessed value; the minting of abundant money for Philippine and Oriental use; the granting of franchises and concessions upon the theory of developing the resources of the archipelago, and therefore not by sale, but upon participation in the profits of the enterprise—

A new socialism—

> the formation of a system of public schools everywhere, with compulsory attendance rigidly enforced; the establishment of the English language throughout the islands, teaching it exclusively in the schools and using it, through interpreters, exclusively in the courts; a simple civil code and a still simpler criminal code, and both common to all the islands except Sulu, Mindanao, and Paluan—

These latter, I suppose, belong to the Sultan of Sulu. We have bought his allegiance—

> American judges for all but smallest offenses; gradual, slow, and careful introduction of the best Filipinos into the working machinery of the government; no promise whatever of the franchise until the people have been prepared for it; all this backed by the necessary force to execute it. This outline of government the situation demands as soon as tranquillity is established. Until then military government is advisable.

And I ask Senators to remember the description he gave of Aguinaldo and see how he fits the place of governor-general, and he had already organized just such a government in many respects.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], who took issue with the Senator from Indiana the other day, committed himself to this proposition in general terms. While criticising our young friend he recognized the necessity for force. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who had a bill introduced which I read, turns the whole thing over to the President, and as to Congress, we know he has got no use for us in carrying on the Government. It does not matter, because we obey orders anyhow—at least Senators on the other side do. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, if you will take that scheme, that plan, that outline, and analyze it, what is the first thought that will come to your mind? That Nero or Caligula prepared it as a memorandum for a Roman general sent to govern a newly conquered province. Under such a scheme of despotism, backed by force, you have soldiers at every turn, to be supported by the people here, and, Mr. President, that scheme is the one that will be followed unless the American people shall rise in their wrath, like Uncle Sam did at the Gridiron dinner Saturday night, and march up to the new emperor, Mr. McKinley, and take his crown and purple robe off, and tell him it is time for this foolishness to stop. It is time for this foolishness to stop, Mr. President. It never ought to have started. But there is time yet for us to retrace our steps.

In addition to this scheme outlined by the Senator from Indiana with such fullness, and to show whither we are drifting, I saw in yesterday's paper that the Committee on Puerto Rico had decided that wherever in the bill before this body for the government of that island the word "constitution" occurs, it was to be stricken out, and that law, if it becomes a law, will allow those people to be governed by Congress, and the guaranties of the Constitution are to remain in a condition of paralysis. Why? Puerto Rico has not been in insurrection! Puerto Rico even stood Spain's tyranny without complaint, and its people are peaceful and obedient. What is the matter with Puerto Rico?

I do not know, but from the source that the amendment came I judge that there is tobacco raised in Puerto Rico, and that there is some similar tobacco raised in Connecticut, and that is the reason the Constitution shall not be extended over Puerto Rico. I will be obliged if some one will tell me where Congress gets such power. I have been innocent and foolish enough to think that whatever the United States bought or conquered belonged to it and came under the flag and the Constitution both; but the Constitution will not apply to Puerto Rico if this committee has its way. The reason is that under the Constitution, if the Supreme Court does not retrace its steps, our excises and taxes must be uniform everywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States, and therefore we can not put a tariff against Puerto Rican tobacco for the protection of the Connecticut seed leaf.

Mind you, that is a mere guess. I hope I will not do anybody from Connecticut any wrong in charging that this scheme emanated there. It is certainly a startling proposition, and Puerto Rico is to be governed just as Spain governed it.

According to the best reports, we have already done to death anywhere from 50,000 to 100,000 Filipinos—men, women, and children. If Otis's dispatches are even approximately correct, the number will exceed the larger figure.

Mr. President, is it any source of satisfaction to those who gave the President the excuse for this war, who backed him in it, to know, as I will now tell them, that during the three hundred years of Spanish domination the Spaniards never put to death one-half that number? Yet the President proclaims that it is the providence of God and in the interest of liberty, law, and order. I recall the famous saying, I do not know who was the author of it, probably it may have been Suwarrow, that "order reigns in Warsaw."

It was a dispatch sent, I think, to the Empress Catherine; if not, it could have been. Order in Warsaw meant that that devoted city had been taken by assault; that it lay in ashes, or the largest proportion of it, and that nearly all of its inhabitants, men, women, and children, had been put to the sword. We have heard that order reigns in Iloilo. We know that once flourishing city, a large proportion of it, is now in ashes; and in many parts of the Philippine Islands there is no description at all adequate or that will give us a clear idea of the situation better than that contained in Byron's line:

> He makes a solitude and calls it peace.

Now, here is the most astonishing part. I do not know that I ought to say anything about it after the crushing answer of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], but I have to do it to round out my thought. The Senator from Indiana, after giving us the outline of the plan of government for these islands, said:

> Such a government will have its effect upon us here in America, too. Model administration there will be an example created by ourselves for model administration here; and our own example is the only one Americans ever heed. It is not true that charity begins at home. Selfishness begins there; but charity begins abroad and ends in its full glory in the home. It is not true that perfect government must be achieved at home before administering it abroad; its exercise abroad is a suggestion, an example, and a stimulus for the best government at home. It is as if we projected ourselves upon a living screen and beheld ourselves at work.

The government we set up, this despotism propped by bayonets, is to be a school in which Americans will learn how to govern so well they will be brought back to improve on our own boasted self-government.

The Senator quotes Scripture. We are urged as follows:

> Cast thy bread upon the waters, and after many days it shall return unto you.
> With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

We are going to measure out good government or this kind of government, and we are to receive it back to us after many days. I have heard somewhere that "the devil can quote Scripture for his purpose," and, Mr. President, even I can quote Scripture for my purpose. [Laughter.] "And verily, verily, I say unto you," Senator from Indiana, "that ye can not gather grapes from thorns nor figs from thistles," and if ye mete out despotism and bayonet rule to those unfortunate people, that rule will come back to you again as sure as there is a God in heaven who watches over the destinies of peoples. The despotism of rule by the bayonet can not come to us through any foreign foe. We are too strong for any nation—for any combination of nations—to dare attack us.

We read in history that the Roman Empire traveled this path of glory and universal control over the nations of the world; that the liberties of the people disappeared at the center and the empire rotted at the core. We read that the Roman cohorts and legions which were sent to maintain Roman authority in Germany, in Dalmatia, in Asia Minor, in Spain, in Gaul, in England, in Africa, in Egypt, occasionally returned and got together and put the emperorship up at auction to the highest bidder so as to have money with which to gratify their lusts. "Old age, sickness, death, and hell" are believed by some men to be the destiny of everybody except themselves. History and historical illustration and the lessons which may be obtained by reading carefully the course of other nations are not for our Republic. This one has a charmed life; it can not go that way. So gentlemen seem to think.

Mr. President, what have we got right now? We have men, liberty-loving and free-born American citizens, under the throttle of the Army of the United States in Idaho, and any other State in this Union is liable at any moment to undergo the same experience. Our danger lies in familiarizing our citizens to uphold a despotic and a military government in those islands, the inevitable consequence of which is a large standing army with which to do it; and that large standing army will afford the means and the temptation to use it for a similar purpose here when some future Cæsar comes along and our rottenness and corruption will have gone far enough to make us look on quietly in one part of the country while the other is being despotically governed by military rule.

That has been the history of every republic of the past. Men of the North, you have never lived under a carpetbag government, propped by bayonets, as I have, and seen negro militia march by your door threatening the lives of your wives and children. You do not know what it is to have bayonet rule. God forbid you ever should. But are we going to have any peace in the Philippines? Is the conquest of those islands going to be perfect? There is some talk that now they will hang these scattered bands if they catch any of them, those guerrillas, and it is said that they are mere robbers.

Why, Mr. President, during the Revolutionary war, when Great Britain's armies overran the entire State of South Carolina from the mountain to the sea; when there was not a foot of territory that was not occupied by British troops and all the Whigs had to hide in the woods or to cross over into North Carolina or into Georgia; when Marion, the "Swamp Fox," and Sumter, the "Gamecock," and the other men who fought and continued to fight were hiding out and making their little expeditions against the redcoats with 30, 40, or 100 men, they were guerrillas. They were like these Tagals.

Is it proposed that we shall forget everything of our own history that is noble and ennobling in order to carry out this damnable programme? The Tagals having once tasted of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, having had a taste of liberty—and freedom from Spanish rule is my definition of Tagal liberty—having, as I say, had that taste, are they going to quietly subside and become the simple, cowardly, peaceful, submissive creatures that they were before?

All history teaches us to the contrary. Bruce and Wallace in Scotland, Tell in Switzerland, William of Orange in Holland, Kosciusko in Poland, the only one who failed, and last but not least—no, possibly the greatest of them all—Oom Paul Kruger and his little band of Dutch in South Africa give the lie to the proposition that these men will quietly submit and become the abject slaves even of the great United States. They do not want our liberty. They want their own liberty, worse than ours though it may be. And remembering that the death of Leonidas and his 300 spartans inspired the Greeks with such courage that although the struggle seemed hopeless and very few of the Grecian confederates were willing even to dare make the fight, the Athenians, with the few auxiliaries inspired by his deathless example, fought the battle of Marathon and drove the Persian hordes, twenty times their number, back to Asia.

Nobody expects the Tagals to drive us out. They do not know the hopelessness of attempting to get their freedom. No brave people ever did calculate as to whether they would win or not, and no brave people ever will.

Right here I want to say that the blood of the American soldiers is as dear to me as anybody. I pity, from the bottom of my soul, the officers and men of the American Army who are out there doing this dirty work because they have to obey orders. But I love to believe, and I do believe, with Byron that—

> Freedom's battle once begun,
> Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son,
> Tho' baffled oft is ever won.

Mr. President, as one who loves liberty and loves his country and believes that its true greatness lies in clinging to the ideals of our fathers, I protest against the continuance of this unholy war. Let us be rid of the dangers and pitfalls that lie in the course we are pursuing. Let us remain true to the precepts of the great founders of our Government.

What is it our duty to do? First, stop this war. How? By telling those people that we do not want to have them governed after our methods. By saying to them, "Come together and piece up the government you had, or any other you now want. We will warn Europe and all other depredators off your shores."

That will be some recompense. We can protect them against outside interference. We can retain whatever territory we may need for a naval station. We could make a compact with them which would give us any advantages we might desire or need in the way of commerce. We could have done this a year ago much easier than we can now, but it is not too late to do right. It is never too late to do right. If we do not, if we continue our bloody tyrannical course, if we say to them you must submit to the last man, and there must not be a man left in those islands who declares or claims that he is not a subject of the United States, we may establish peace.

We can, I suppose, suppress and repress and continue to kill and murder, for it is murder. We had no right there at the beginning—I mean in the way we have undertaken. We captured Manila from Spain, and that we had title to. Spain ceded it to us. We can retain it if we want to in law and in morals. But the balance of the islands are not ours, and they never were ours in any legal aspect or sense. I repeat what I have already said, that if the civil war was not a mistake, if it was not a hideous blunder and crime, let us stop; because if that war was for freeing the slave and establishing in this Government the principle that equality and liberty in the Union were its purposes, this Filipino war is a war of conquest and nothing else, and is a crime in the sight of God and man. [Applause in the galleries.]

During the delivery of Mr. TILLMAN'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RAWLINS in the chair). Will the Senator from South Carolina suspend for a moment? The Chair lays before the Senate, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside to allow the Senator from South Carolina to finish his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that order will be made.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

After the conclusion of Mr. TILLMAN'S speech,

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Elkins,	McBride,	Rawlins,
Allen,	Fairbanks,	McEnery,	Ross,
Allison,	Foraker,	McLaurin,	Scott,
Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Spooner,
Berry,	Hanna,	Mason,	Stewart,
Beveridge,	Hansbrough,	Money,	Taliaferro,
Butler,	Harris,	Nelson,	Teller,
Chilton,	Hawley,	Penrose,	Thurston,
Clark, Mont.	Heitfeld,	Perkins,	Tillman,
Clay,	Kean,	Pettus,	Turner,
Cockrell,	Kenney,	Platt, Conn.	Warren,
Cullom,	Lindsay,	Proctor,	Wellington,
Davis,	Lodge,	Quarles,	Wetmore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimons consent to take from the table for a moment the bill which I introduced some time ago in relation to the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to take from the table a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) relative to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked that that bill might lie upon the table when it was introduced, intending to call it up and submit to the Senate some observations upon it and upon the general subject. I have been requested to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Philippines. I ask, therefore, that it be so referred. I intend, if I may be permitted to say so, at an early day, when consistent with the convenience of the Senate, to address the Senate upon the general subject, but I can do so upon some of the pending resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MARY STOTSENBURG.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2052) granting a pension to Mary Stotsenberg.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the name "Mary," to strike out "Stotsenberg" and insert "La Tourrette Stotsenburg;" and in line 7, after the name "John M.," to strike out "Stotsenberg" and insert "Stotsenburg;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary La Tourrette Stotsenburg, widow of the late Col. John M. Stotsenburg, of the First Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, in the year 1898, and pay her a pension of $50 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary La Tourrette Stotsenburg."

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that twenty minutes may now be given to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar favorably reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that twenty minutes may now be given to the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unobjected cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unobjected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unobjected pension bills on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JAMES H. LATHAM.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will, with the understanding that it will not be taken from the twenty minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 6) for the relief of James H. Latham may be now considered. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I give notice that after this bill is passed I shall object to any bill on the Calendar except the regular order. There are forty or fifty bills on the Calendar which have passed Congress heretofore, and we must take them in their order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Connecticut?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order dismissing James H. Latham from service as a captain of the Twenty-first Regiment of Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and to issue a certificate of honorable discharge for him, to date from the 14th day of June, 1865; and provides that Latham shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the date above mentioned.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first pension bill, under the unanimous-consent agreement, will be stated.

MARY JACKMAN.

The bill (S. 1329) granting a pension to Mary Jackman was announced as the first case in order on the Calendar, and was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary Jackman, dependent mother of James M. Jackman, late of Company E, First Regiment Heavy Artillery, New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REBECCA P. QUINT.

The bill (S. 1796) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca P. Quint was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Rebecca P. Quint, widow of Alonzo H. Quint, late chaplain of the Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISE DONATH.

The bill (S. 35) granting a pension to Louise Donath was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Louise Donath, permanently helpless and dependent child of John G. Donath, late a hospital steward in the military service of the United States, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month, payable to her legally constituted guardian.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAROLINE V. ENGLISH.

The bill (S. 39) granting an increase of pension to Caroline V. English, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas C. English, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "provisions," to insert "and limitations;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline V. English, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas C. English, Second United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Caroline V. English."

CHARLES L. GREEN.

The bill (S. 1711) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Green was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Charles L. Green, late of Company A, Eighteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. RANDALL.

The bill (S. 2368) granting a pension to Mary A. Randall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary A. Randall, dependent mother of Frank B. Randall, late chief engineer of the U. S. revenue cutter McCulloch, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN STRATTON.

The bill (S. 2367) granting a pension to Susan Stratton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Susan Stratton, dependent mother of Edward P. Stratton, late of Company K, Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALICE S. JORDAN.

The bill (S. 1713) granting an increase of pension to Alice S. Jordan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Alice S. Jordan, widow of John W. Jordan, late paymaster in the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY ELLEN BESSOM.

The bill (S. 240) granting a pension to Nancy Ellen Bessom was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the word "daughter," to insert "invalid and dependent;" in line 9, after the word "her," to insert "a pension at the rate of;" in the same line, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twelve," and in the same line, before the word "month," to strike out the letter "a" and insert "per;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Ellen Bessom, invalid and dependent daughter of James F. Bessom, deceased, late a private in Company C, Eighth Regiment Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISA M. WRIGHT.

The bill (S. 1353) granting an increase of pension to Louisa M. Wright was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 6, after the name "Wright," to strike out "deceased," and, in line 7, after the word "late," to strike out "brigadier-general" and insert "major-general;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louisa M. Wright, widow of Horatio G. Wright, late major-general and Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, before the word "dollars," in line 9, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "a" and insert "per;" and in the same line, after the word "month," to strike out "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving;" so as to read:

And grant her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the original bill provided a hundred dollars a month, and this as it stands is a House amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; a Senate amendment. The bill has recently been reported from the Senate Committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the Senate committee, to my sorrow, cuts it down to $50. Horatio G. Wright was a very distinguished officer, and his widow is, I think, 80 years old or more, with limited means. I think the Congress of the United States would do itself justice by leaving the bill as it originally was, providing a pension of a hundred dollars a month instead of giving to an old lady for the few years that remain to her a pension of $50 a month only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as stated.

Mr. BERRY. What is the amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the amendment may be rejected. It reduces the pension from a hundred dollars to fifty dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, before the word "dollars," strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" after the word "dollars" strike out "a" and insert "per," and after the word "month" strike out "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving;" so as to read:

And grant her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if there are not a number of widows of other officers of the same rank that this officer held who get only $50?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that there are, but I do not think that the cases are so strong as this is.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I can see no reason why one lady should be selected out of a class and given a hundred dollars a month while others whose husbands bore the same rank in the war and rendered the same service, at least rendered the best service they could, receive fifty. I think it is unjust, unfair, and there is no reason in it. I think the committee were right about it when they cut it down to $50, and the Senate ought to ratify the action of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know of any widows of major-generals whose pensions have been cut down and kept at $50. This was a very distinguished officer, who rendered great service. His wife is over 80 years of age and of limited means.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire what, under the law, is the pension for the widow of a major-general?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the law, $30; but Mrs. Wright was unable to get that at the Bureau. She is not pensionable at all under the general law, her husband not having died of pensionable disabilities.

Mr. BERRY. So that under the law she is really entitled to no pension?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. But the pension of a major-general's widow is $30.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir; provided she has a pensionable status.

Mr. BERRY. It seems to me that ought to be conclusive.

Mr. HAWLEY. Her claim was rejected at the Pension Office because it can not be said that her husband's death was due to disease incurred in the service.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. HAWLEY. He lived to a very respectable age—something like 80 years, I believe.

Mr. GALLINGER. Eighty years.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this case much, and shall not, but I simply want to say to the Senate that the Committee on Pensions has before it a very serious problem in the matter of granting large pensions to general officers and the widows of general officers. I have heretofore expressed myself in regard to what I think was improvident legislation a few years ago, whereby very large pensions were granted to certain widows, and which has led all other widows of general officers to feel that they can come here and get pretty much what they ask for.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will pardon me. He is speaking of pensions of two or three thousand dollars a year, I suppose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, a hundred dollars a month. There are a good many of those.

Everybody admits that General Wright was a very distinguished officer; there is no question at all about it. The committee has not ascertained the precise amount of property Mrs. Wright has, but we have taken the word of her friends that she has not much property. The fact is, we are giving this lady by this proposed pension act a gratuity of $50 a month.

Mr. HAWLEY. A gratuity?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is right to say that it is a gratuity, inasmuch as she has no pensionable status. If, on the other hand, we should increase the pension of another officer's widow from $30 under the general law she having a status there, to $75, she would only get $45 a month. Pass the pending bill at $100, and it will be utterly impossible for this committee to resist the importunities which are coming to me every day in my committee room and in my hotel and on the street of a large class of worthy widows, whose husbands gave distinguished services to the Government in the Army, and we will be forced to amend our rules and to grant the same rate of pension to all widows under similar circumstances.

We adopted a rule in the last Congress, Mr. President, that this committee would not report a pension for any widow at a higher rate than $50 a month. Of course the Senate in its wisdom can overrule the committee and grant a hundred dollars a month to this particular widow if it chooses to do it, but, representing the committee, I am bound to say I hope the Senate will not do it, and I shall have to vote against the proposition made by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I do hope that the Senate will stand by the Committee on Pensions in this matter. I believe the position they have taken is fair, and reasonable, and just; and to my certain knowledge if you transgress the limit of $50 a month, you will have hundreds upon hundreds of cases here demanding the higher rate, and I for one shall feel that it will be my duty to advocate them at a hundred dollars a month just as much as this one. You can not make fish of one and something else of another. The Committee on Pensions have deliberately settled upon this. We maintained that position during the last Congress; and if it is maintained a short time longer, we will have none of these applications and we will not have the heartburning that we have throughout the length and breadth of this land on the part of widows, helpless and dependent, who are at the washtub making their living, and who say it is a crime that these ladies in comparatively comfortable circumstances shall be paid a hundred dollars a month and they paid the little pittance of eight or twelve dollars.

I tell you it is creating an intense feeling in this country, and I have had letter after letter in regard to it. But I have stood by the Committee on Pensions. If the Senate will continue to stand by them, I will do so; but if the bars are to be torn down, then grab and take everything you can get.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, if this rule is going to be rigidly enforced now, after all these years, it is very unfortunate for the widow of this major-general. There have been plenty of pensions granted over and over again by the Senate where there was not the real merit that should govern this case—pensions of a hundred dollars to the widows of Army officers.

General Wright was indeed a very distinguished officer of the Army, much more so than in the case of many pensions of a hundred dollars which have been granted to widows in times past. He was in command of the Sixth Army Corps, and I think I do not stop outside of the bounds of truth when I say that it was his energy and his remarkable celerity in bringing up the Sixth Army Corps through Washington that saved the capital of the country from capture by the Confederate troops.

The history of that is familiar. If it had not been for his unusual promptness and unusual effort in marching the Sixth Army Corps to the relief of Washington and through Washington, confronting the enemy just outside of Washington, the capital of the country would, in my judgment, have been in Confederate hands.

Now, it seems to me that it is a poor time to make a discrimination, for it is a discrimination, between this pension and the pensions of $100 a month which have been granted heretofore.

Mr. COCKRELL. There have been very few comparatively granted at $100 a month. It has been a long time since one has been granted at $100 a month.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest, as long as this case is liable to lead to discussion more or less prolonged, that it be passed over for the time being, holding its place on the Calendar, and that we take up the uncontested cases on the Calendar of the Senate and dispose of those. It seems to me that that would be the better course to pursue, and I make that suggestion to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is proper.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation before this case is passed over. I am decidedly in favor of sustaining the committee rule. There is a rule adopted by the committee that no pension shall exceed $50 a month. Fifty dollars is quite a sum of money if it is judiciously used. It will not buy many luxuries, but it will buy the necessaries of life.

The odious distinction that is sought to be thrust upon the bill and upon the country by this amendment is not by any means a new distinction in this Chamber. Whenever it is sought to increase a pension beyond its proper proportions, it is always upon the argument that the soldier whose widow is to be pensioned was a distinguished officer of the Army, as though all men who performed their duty, whether officers or private soldiers, are not properly classified as distinguished men.

I knew of General Wright only as a historical character. I did not serve in the eastern part of the country during the war. I knew of him as the successor, I think, of Sedgwick, after the death of that distinguished general.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not doubt, Mr. President, that he was an excellent soldier. I do not want anyone to suppose that I would question his capacity, or his loyalty, or the character of his services. But, Mr. President, there were other soldiers in the war besides General Wright who performed their duty equally as well. Some of them lost their lives during the service. Their widows are not getting a pension of $50 a month, and it is not proposed to pension them beyond eight or twelve dollars, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, because they happen to be the wives of men who were carrying guns and doing the fighting while the other man was carrying a sword and doing the directing.

All soldiers, in my judgment, who performed their duty, from the humblest in the ranks to the man in chief who was commanding the army, ought to stand equally before the law; and I hope I may never become so old and so feeble in intellect as to reach the conclusion that there is a distinction between this deserving class of people. We undertake here by these distinctions, these distinctions created by statute, to say to the people of this Republic that one man by force of the mere fact that he was in command of an army is entitled to more recognition at the hands of his Government than the men who did his bidding under him. That is not right; that is not true.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it not true that General Wright received far above the average of pay? He had the pay of a brigadier-general and of a major-general. Now, do you want to bring suit against his estate for the recovery of the surplus?

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President, I would leave it to the Senator from Connecticut to do a thing so foolish as that; I would not do it. That seems to be his method of reasoning.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By the law a lieutenant-colonel's widow gets $30 per month. Does the Senator think there should be no distinction as to the amount between the widow of a private and the widow of a lieutenant-colonel or a colonel?

M. ALLEN. If they are equally meritorious, no. Why should there be a distinction?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has been the law always that there has been a distinction. If it has gone on a false basis——

Mr. ALLEN. There have been a great many laws in the history of the world that were wrong. I suppose the Senator from Connecticut would not repeal a law that has existed for one hundred years because it had been enacted at one time and was still the law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But in all the Senator's service in Congress he has introduced no bill to repeal the law which gives to a lieutenant-colonel's widow $30 a month.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I do not want to repeal it, either.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then the Senator thinks there should be some distinction?

Mr. ALLEN. I would bring the pension of the meritorious wife of the private soldier up to $30 a month.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the pension proposed in this case is $50 a month under the committee report. I do not understand him to oppose the report of the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not opposing $50 a month.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator favors $50 a month for this widow.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But as I understood the Senator from Nebraska, he was saying that there should be no distinction.

Mr. ALLEN. There should be none.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Between the widow of a private and the widow of a general officer.

Mr. ALLEN. Can the Senator from Connecticut on my right—I do not know whether he is the junior or senior Senator; I have never looked up the classification——

Mr. HAWLEY. The senior.

Mr. ALLEN. Can the senior Senator from Connecticut tell me why there should be a distinction between the equally meritorious wife of an officer and of a private soldier?

Mr. HAWLEY. The law makes it, and always has made it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The law makes it.

Mr. ALLEN. Both gentlemen from Connecticut answer that the law makes the distinction and always has made it. The law, Mr. President, years ago made it lawful to kill men who had epilepsy, upon the supposition that they were afflicted with witches. Because that law existed I suppose we are to be told that men must be still killed for that cause, and that the law shall never be changed.

The men, Mr. President, who through the enactment of law made a distinction between the meritorious wife of a private soldier and the meritorious wife of an officer did not, in my humble judgment, understand their business and were not warranted in doing so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I hope he will agree to let this bill be passed over and allow the time to be extended for the consideration of a few more unobjected cases.

Mr. ALLEN. I am willing that the bill shall be passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the time be extended ten minutes, and we can dispose of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The twenty minutes which were granted for the consideration of pension bills have been exhausted.

Mr. GALLINGER. That ends it on this bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I infer from that remark that it is the desire of the Chair that I shall not speak any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has no right to make such an inference.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly that is true; possibly I have no right to debate this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I spoke simply because there are several bills still on the Calendar pensioning private soldiers and the widows of private soldiers and I hoped to get them passed at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to be heard further on this bill, but I can make my remarks at some other time. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the time be extended until 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the time allotted for the consideration of pension bills be extended until 5 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will report the next pension bill on the Calendar.

WILLIAM H. H. NEVITT.

The bill (S. 872) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Nevitt was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 4, after the word "roll," to insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" in line 7, after the word "Ohio," to insert "Volunteer;" in the same line, after the word "Infantry," to strike out "Volunteers;" and in line 9, before the word "he," to strike out "the pension" and insert "that;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. H. Nevitt, late a private in Company F, One hundred and fifty-ninth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HAMLEY.

The bill (S. 266) granting an increase of pension to William Hamley was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Hamley, late private in Company B, Forty-first Wisconsin Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE M'MAHON.

The bill (S. 265) granting an increase of pension to Jane McMahon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Jane McMahon, widow of Bernard J. McMahon, late captain Companies F and C, Seventy-first Pennsylvania Infantry, and sergeant, Company G, Fifth United States Artillery, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY R. BACON.

The bill (S. 1296) granting a pension to Mary R. Bacon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary R. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, NATIONAL CITY BANK, NEW YORK, ETC.

Mr. DALZELL. I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read the following resolution, introduced by Mr. SULZER January 12, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That a special committee, consisting of nine members of the House of Representatives, be immediately appointed by the Speaker to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any other national bank of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1897, to the present time, and especially in regard to all letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States, or any person connected therewith, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any person acting for them, or either of them, since the 4th day of March, 1897, relating to the depositing of public funds, bonds, or revenues in said bank or banks or any other relations or business transactions now existing or heretofore had between the Government and the said banks, or either of them, and the amount of public money, bonds, or revenue deposited with said banks, or either of them, or with any national bank, by the Government, upon what security, for what length of time, and the reasons therefor, and whether said banks, or any of them, have paid the Government any interest on said deposits, and if so, how much, and all other information concerning the same or in any way relating thereto; and also the date of the sale of the custom-house property of the United States in New York City to said National City Bank, the date of the execution of the deed thereto, the date and manner of payment of the purchase money therefor, the disposition of the proceeds of said sale, and whether or not the Government has paid any rents for said property, or any portion thereof, for any purpose since the day of sale, and if so, to whom, and all facts relating to said transaction, and all other matters in connection therewith or in any way relating thereto; and said committee is authorized to send for persons, books, letters, telegrams, papers, documents, and agreements, administer oaths, and hold open sessions, and sit at any time in any place in the city of Washington, New York, or Chicago, the expense for the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some one acting for him, shall attend said committee and carry out its mandates; and said committee is instructed to make a report to the House of Representatives, with testimony and exhibits, with all convenient speed.

The recommendation of the Committee on Rules was read, as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration House resolution No. 90, relating to a proposed investigation of the Treasury Department, refer the same back to the House with a recommendation that said resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman why we can not have the previous question on this resolution, and thus allow the usual debate of a few minutes on each side?

Mr. DALZELL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Just move the previous question. That will give us twenty minutes. We may not use half of that.

Mr. DALZELL. We may save time by making some arrangement without the previous question. I may be willing to yield the gentleman perhaps as much time as he desires. How much would he like to occupy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to have five minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] five minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield five minutes to each gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that some time since the gentleman from New York addressed a resolution of inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury which is substantially covered by this resolution. To that inquiry the Secretary of the Treasury made reply. That reply has been sent, under the rules of the House, to the Committee on Ways and Means. It has seemed proper, therefore, to the Committee on Rules that, as the Committee on Ways and Means is already in possession of all the information that has been sent here by the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be the proper committee to pass on this resolution.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to antagonize this matter, because there is something in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Committee on Ways and Means ought to make this investigation, if there is to be one. I am decidedly of the opinion that there ought to be an investigation of this matter. In speaking of this matter a few days ago I insisted that there must be some motive, some reason why the Secretary of the Treasury, when he sold this custom-house property in New York to the City National Bank, did not complete the title by conveying the property to that bank. I at that time called attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury took a paper credit with that bank for a considerable part of the purchase money, $3,215,000, the total amount being $3,265,000, leaving the pitiful sum of $50,000 unpaid or uncredited.

Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, why that was done? Not a dollar of money, it seems, was ever checked out of that money. The entire $3,215,000 remained credited by him, not a dollar of the money having ever been used.

There was some reason for that. What was it? I insist that the reason has been developed, and that it was the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury, by agreement with the City National Bank of New York, to excuse that bank from paying taxes to the city and State of New York. The Government of the United States agreed to pay rent to the City National Bank for the property that they sold, and yet they acted in such a way as to prevent the city and State of New York from collecting taxes on the property.

The following letter was sent by the Secretary of the Treasury to the United States Senate, and shows the Government has agreed to pay rent for the property:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 22, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that there be included in the urgent deficiency bill, now under consideration, the following item of appropriation:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay rent for use of property known as the old custom-house in New York City, formerly belonging to the United States, from August 28, 1899, to June 30, 1900, both inclusive, 307 days, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum on the purchasing price, as provided in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899 (30 Stat., 969), $109,847.12."

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The Secretary of the Treasury made this special request to Congress to allow him $109,000 for the purpose of paying rent upon property sold in the manner I have described. The bank has kept back the $50,000. The Secretary has not demanded that credit upon the books of the bank. I insist that this was for some purpose. What was it? Simply to prevent the bank from being liable to the city and State of New York for something like fifty or one hundred thousand dollars (whatever the amount may be) of taxation which would have been collectible upon that property. What other motive could there have been?

If it be true that the Secretary of the Treasury has, in his official capacity, exercising the great powers of the office conferred upon him, entered into a personal partnership with a favored bank in the city of New York to prevent the city and State from collecting taxes, no man on this floor, I take it, will contend that he does not deserve censure and condemnation. If in the exercise of official powers he has enabled a favored national bank to escape taxation due to the city and State of New York to the amount of $75,000, if his action was taken with that object, then certainly some cognizance should be taken of the fact. The statement made shows that a large amount of money has been made by this bank by reason of his action. It shows that the Government of the United States did not receive the purchase money, for a large amount was retained in the bank, and at the same time the State and city of New York were not allowed the opportunity of taxing this property. The whole amount, as I am informed, reaches something like the sum of $357,000 that this juggling on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury had enabled this bank to make.

It is not right or proper, Mr. Speaker, for the Secretary of the Treasury to go into partnership with a banking institution, such as is indicated here, while he is occupying the high position that he is now filling. This bank is favored for some reason or other which has not been fully defined or stated to the House.

But I am content to let this resolution go to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Secretary of the Treasury himself ought to come and ask for permission to appear before some committee of the House to make explanation why he left the $50,000 unpaid in this transaction.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Rules for acting so promptly on my request for immediate action on this resolution for an investigation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Speaker is to be commended for his determination to take some action on my resolution for an investigation of the Treasury Department in relation to its transactions with the Standard Oil trust.

I introduced this resolution on the 12th day of this month, because the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to my first resolution was incomplete, evasive, unsatisfactory, and on its face clearly demonstrated that an investigation was imperative.

A few days ago I requested the Speaker, who is chairman of the Committee on Rules, verbally and in writing, for a hearing for myself and others, and demanded that the Committee on Rules take action in regard to this resolution for an investigation. All the facts and all the circumstances of the case made this necessary. Every day, as the light is let in and the facts come out, the matter grows worse.

In the remarks I made in this House on the 17th day of January I said most emphatically that the Republican party could not afford to smother this resolution for an investigation, that it could not ignore it, and that action must be taken by this House.

This is a grave public matter, and the people of the entire country are deeply exercised and interested in it. They are watching the Administration and the majority of this House to find out whether this investigation shall be had in order that the whole truth shall come out, or whether the Republican party intends to stand by and shield the scandalous conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury and endeavor to cover up the iniquities of his administration of the Treasury Department. In a little while we shall know. Let me suggest to you, however, that the people are not in a mood to be trifled with. In this matter you should act promptly and go to the end.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the country demand a rigid and searching investigation. Nothing must be left to conjecture or suspicion. They want to know all the facts in the interest of truth and publicity. They demand this investigation in order that the facts may be ascertained, to the end that remedial legislation be enacted that will forever prevent a repetition of governmental favoritism to the Standard Oil trust, the most heartless monopoly of the times and the greatest menace to our free institutions. In my judgment, the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the Standard Oil trust is infamous.

I agree with all that my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has so forcibly and truly said regarding the New York custom-house scandal. That is bad enough, to be sure, but there are matters of much greater importance, graver significance, and of a more infamous character regarding the administration of the Treasury Department that will come out if we have a fair and impartial investigation.

If I mistake not public opinion, the people of the country are deeply incensed by the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. They believe that he has willfully violated the law, that he has done wrong, and that any attempt on the part of the majority members of this House to now apologize for his conduct or to cover up his iniquities will only make the matter worse and the demand for this investigation louder and stronger.

It is said, sir, and not denied, that the Secretary of the Treasury permitted himself to be used by and was a tool of the Standard Oil trust; that he gave his influence, lent his aid and the money of the people to that gigantic trust to manipulate the stock market in Wall street to the injury of its competitors, to the financial ruin of many, and all to the advantage of the Rockefellers. The people of this country will never consent that the money in their Treasury be turned over to the Standard Oil Trust for speculative purposes.

There seems to be no doubt that the National City Bank, the mere agency of the Standard Oil people, and owned and controlled by that insatiable trust, received special privileges from the Secretary of the Treasury beyond all reason. Perhaps there was a reason for it. Perhaps it was because the Standard Oil trust directors of the National City Bank rendered great aid to the Republican party in the campaign of 1896, as Mr. Hepburn in his letter to the Secretary of the Treasury unwittingly says, and that the campaign debt and the great political claims of the directors were being paid by the Republican party with the money of the people through the agency of the Treasury Department.

An investigation will bring out all the facts in connection with this matter, and you dare not refuse it. We want to subpœna the officers and the directors of the National City Bank and find out from them what aid they rendered the Republican party in the last national campaign, what great political claims they have, and just what favors, by way of payment, they have received from the Republican party since the 4th day of March, 1897.

We charge that the selection and the singling out of this Standard Oil bank in Wall street for special favors by the Secretary of the Treasury in the face of what he knew and what the country now knows is the most suspicious circumstance in all the transactions between the Treasury Department and the national banks, and ought to be and must be probed to the bottom to the end that the truth shall be known and the responsibility fixed.

Mr. Speaker, it is said, and the letters in the answer submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury seem to bear it out, that the Treasury Department has been used by the Standard Oil trust to rob its rivals, depress the stock market, and force innocent men to sacrifice securities at a ruinous loss. The trust made millions by it. This should not be, and the people will never condone the offense. No gambling with the money of the people should be the watchword of the day.

The Secretary of the Treasury has been aiding and helping the National City Bank ever since he has been in office, and the bank and the men behind it, by reason of this favoritism, have made millions and millions of dollars out of the people—yes, out of the people and by the money of the taxpayers. The people of this country know something about the Standard Oil trust; no one on this floor dares to defend it; and in my judgment no agent of this gigantic monopoly should administer the affairs of the Treasury Department.

This whole matter presents a sad spectacle of public ethics and official degeneration. When all the truth comes out I predict it will be one of the gravest public scandals ever known in our history. Let me say to you that it can not be covered up and it can not be smothered. The truth will and must come out, and when it does I believe it will be graver and more scandalous than the people imagine.

I indulged the hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Rules would have the courage to report this resolution favorably and not shift responsibility to the Committee on Ways and Means. I asked and I wanted the Committee on Rules to report the resolution favorably. That is what you should have done.

I trusted the Speaker to select a committee that would do impartial justice to the Secretary of the Treasury and the people. Now that the whole matter is to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means for its action, I desire to say that I hope the Ways and Means Committee will immediately begin the investigation or, if it does not want to make the investigation, that it will forthwith report this resolution back to the House and instruct the Speaker to select a committee of nine to immediately begin a searching and a rigid investigation of all the dealings and all the transactions of the Secretary of the Treasury with the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank from the 4th day of March, 1897, down to the present time.

I hope there will be no more shifting, no more evasion, no more jugglery, and in that respect, sir, I serve notice on the Ways and Means Committee that any attempt on its part to ignore this investigation, or to cover it up in order to protect and shield the Secretary of the Treasury or the Administration, will not be tolerated by the people of this country. You have the matter squarely presented and must take action. Refuse the investigation, and your refusal will be confession.

The whole country is now familiar with the facts which the Secretary of the Treasury has presented and with the surrounding circumstances growing out of the same, and it believes, and will continue to believe, that the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of malfeasance in office, of dereliction in the faithful performance of duty, and that his conduct in office should be thoroughly investigated.

I want to say that any man who permits himself to be made the tool of the Standard Oil trust is unfit to be Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury should demand this investigation if he is an honest man, in justice to himself and to his reputation. If he does not, he must not blame the people of the country if they take his refusal as an admission of guilt, and all the power of the Administration, let me tell you, will not be able to protect him or save the Republican party from the condemnation of the people.

It is all well enough for the President to say that the person who attacks the Secretary of the Treasury attacks him. But such a feeble assertion and such a flimsy excuse will deceive no one, and ought not to, and I hope will not, deter honest and fearless members of Congress from doing their duty. If the President does not want the Secretary of the Treasury attacked for his wanton violations of law, he should select a Secretary who will faithfully perform his duty and not act as the agent of the Standard Oil trust.

The President is responsible for the Secretary of the Treasury and for his conduct and his acts in office, and he can not escape responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, if what is charged against the Secretary of the Treasury is true, and he has not denied it, and no one on the other side of this House has successfully denied it, then he is unfit to hold the great office he does and should be removed.

No man should hold the purse strings of the people of this great country who permits himself and the money of the people to be used by the Standard Oil trust to manipulate the stock market and force into bankruptcy competitors who can not be otherwise absorbed. Aye, sir, more than that, the people of this country who have looked into this matter and who believe the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of scandalous and outrageous conduct in regard to these transactions with the Standard Oil trust, demand and will continue to demand that he not alone should resign the great office he now occupies, but that this House should order his impeachment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, this discussion on the part of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] is a little premature. The resolution that has been reported here by the Committee on Rules has remitted this whole matter to the Committee on Ways and Means, with authority to investigate the alleged charges and to probe any question that may be open for investigation.

I simply rise for the purpose of protesting against the unfounded, unwarranted, and malicious charges that are made against the Secretary of the Treasury by these gentlemen. What right has the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to impute such false and fraudulent motives to the Secretary of the Treasury as those indulged by him this morning? Has he any evidence upon which to base these remarks? None whatever. When the Secretary of the Treasury was called upon, he presented the entire correspondence and a complete statement of his relations with the bank and the sale of this custom-house, and it is printed and before every member of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman tell us why $50,000 of the purchase money was left unpaid?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to have the gentleman answer that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Every item is presented here, so that he who runs may read; and yet the gentleman, for some purpose not apparent at this time, makes the charge that the Secretary of the Treasury, without any motive upon his part, has entered into a fraudulent contract with the City Bank of the City of New York for the purpose of saving it—what? Something from the Government of the United States? No; for the purpose of saving them from paying taxes to the city of New York and to the State of New York.

What evidence is there of that? I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that there is no evidence whatever. This property was sold; this bank took possession and made a lease; and I claim that the city of New York and the State of New York have the same right to proceed against the bank to pay taxes, if any are due, that they would have if a paper title had actually passed.

These gentlemen would seem to assume, from their statements, that the Government of the United States has lost something by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. Let us look for a moment, Mr. Speaker, at the facts. Under the law the Secretary sold this property. He sold it to the highest and best bidder, and this national bank that has been denounced again and again by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] bid $190,000 for that property more than any other bidder.

So that the Secretary, under the law, was compelled to sell this property to it; and its good faith is demonstrated by the fact that it paid more than $190,000 more than any other person was willing to pay.

Now, what is the next offense? It is that the purchase price of this property was deposited with this bank. Is there anything in law or morals that is wrong in that? This bank, as I showed to the members of the House the other day, is a Government depository, not selected by the present Secretary of the Treasury, but a Government depository selected by a Democratic Administration, selected because of its well-known financial standing; and when the present Secretary came into office, finding the prompt manner in which all of the Government affairs were conducted by it, he simply continued it as one of the depositories.

It has been decided again and again, and can not be disputed by any gentleman familiar with the law and the facts, that a deposit in that bank is the same as a deposit in the subtreasury in the city of New York. The Government of the United States is in the same position exactly, so far as this purchase price is concerned, with the money deposited in that bank as it would have been if the money had been deposited in the subtreasury in the city of New York or in the Treasury here in the city of Washington. I ask them, in the name of common decency and justice, what great wrong has been done by the gentleman who is now presiding with such ability and such patriotism, too, over that great Department of the Government?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is pure buncombe. It is intended for political purposes. Better speeches than those that have been made by gentlemen on this occasion could be found by going back into the RECORD with reference to a former Democratic Secretary of the Treasury making deposits in national banks, and I would advise gentlemen on that side of the House to copy some of the speeches that were made in previous Congresses and repeat them verbatim et literatim. They were made for demagogic purposes then, just as they are now made on that side.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Two propositions have been submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask him this question. I asked the gentleman from Illinois to give us one simple reason why the Secretary of the Treasury retained $50,000, or allowed the bank to retain $50,000, out of the purchase price, and he did not answer.

Mr. HILL. I did not yield for a question to be asked the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now I will ask you to answer that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield, and the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman stated he yielded to me for a question.

Mr. HILL. I yielded for a question to myself, and not to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I want you to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. HILL. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I asked the gentleman to yield for a question, and the Chair would not address me that way, knowing I asked leave to ask a question. I asked a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman said he did not yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman yielded to me for a question.

Mr. HILL. But not to the gentleman from Illinois.

I wish to answer the two questions propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee. First, as to why the Secretary of the Treasury sold this piece of real estate upon the terms on which he did sell it; and the reason was because Congress passed an act in February, 1899, compelling him to do it, and he had no option in the matter. That was one reason and a very essential reason for it. He called for $750,000 cash payment, and the act provided that he might receive from time to time further payments. He did not require an entire cash payment. So that the act itself, passed by the last Congress, is responsible for the mode of sale, and every bidder on that piece of real estate had the same opportunity (and the Secretary of the Treasury could not help himself in this matter) to avail themselves of the terms of the act. So much for that. Now, the gentleman makes a second charge.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HILL. No; I do not.

The gentleman makes a specific charge that the Secretary of the Treasury did this for the purpose of holding the title in the United States and so defrauding the city of New York of the taxes due on that property. That goes to the intent of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it ill becomes the gentleman from Tennessee to charge upon the floor of this House a fraudulent intent upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury in a matter of this kind. Furthermore, if the investigations of the gentleman from Tennessee had gone a little further he would have found that his statement was entirely unfounded, from the fact that the city of New York can lose no taxes by this transaction. I propose to show that. I ask the gentleman to yield me a little further time for the purpose.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HILL. Taxes on national banks——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order, and the gentlemen will suspend for a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman had four or five minutes, and the Chair rapped him down; so——

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from Connecticut had yielded the floor, whereas he was consulting his notes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That, of course, does not come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, upon the question of taxes on national banks, if gentlemen will take the trouble to look at section 5219 of the Revised Statutes they will find that national banks pay tax upon their shares of stock, and it is in the power of the legislature of each State to fix the method by which this tax shall be estimated. As a rule—I am giving the rule of the State of Connecticut, and I presume it is the same in New York—the stock is estimated by the appraisers. Now, it becomes a plain proposition, when real estate is held by the bank and not used for banking purposes it is clearly required to be taxed separately, is taken out of the value of the shares, and that the assessment is so much less on the shares of the stock.

If it is in actual use for banking purposes it is included in the shares of the stock, and then such real estate itself is not taxed separately. But the law of the United States provides:

> But the legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject only to the restrictions that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State.

Now, the gentleman does not for a moment assume that if he held real estate and also personal property, and the whole thing were assessed as personal property, anybody would be defrauded in that matter. The law continues:

> Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL. I should like a couple of minutes more to finish this statement.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I therefore state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the city of New York has lost nothing and can lose nothing by the condition in which this property is placed; for if it were taxed as real estate it would not be included in the capital of the bank, and the shares of the bank which are taxed would be reduced precisely in proportionate value.

I think I have answered the two questions which have been raised here. First, I state that the Secretary of the Treasury was obliged to sell this property on precisely the terms that he did; second, that the city of New York lost not a dollar in the matter of taxation. Therefore, the disreputable charge of the gentleman that the Secretary of the Treasury did this thing with fraudulent intent falls to the ground from the very nature of the case. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining on each side?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes have been used on the right and twelve minutes on the left.

Mr. DALZELL. I then yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to make the division even.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I recur to the question which I propounded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and which I propounded also to the able and astute gentleman from Connecticut. Neither of these gentlemen has vouchsafed any answer to my question. What I asked and what I now repeat is, Why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury did not take a paper credit upon the books of the bank for the additional $50,000 and pass title to the bank?

Why did he not do it? It would have been just as easy to have taken a credit for $3,265,000 as for $3,215,000; no money was being paid. But he did not do it, and as a matter of fact I insist that it was left open to affect the question of taxation. The letters from the bank officers to the Secretary and from him to them show this was the object. Property owned by the Government of the United States, where the Government has the legal title, can not be taxed by the State or city of New York, as I am informed. The National City Bank of New York is refusing to pay taxes claimed by the city and State of New York on this custom-house property by reason of the fact that the legal title is in the Government of the United States. Why was it kept there? That is what I ask. Why was not the $50,000 additional credit taken?

Mr. Speaker, national banks, as is known by all lawyers, have no right under the national-bank law to take title to real estate for renting or speculative purposes. They only have the right to take it in the course of the collection of debts or for their own banking facility.

This bank has, by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, purchased real estate worth $3,500,000. While its capital stock is only $7,000,000, it has put into real estate one-half of that capital stock. Mr. Speaker, is that legitimate? I say it is not.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it must be very obvious to the House that the question which has been discussed during the last few minutes is not the question before the House at all. A resolution was sent to the Committee on Rules calling for the appointment of a special committee to investigate certain charges made against the Secretary of the Treasury. Those charges have already been replied to by the Secretary of the Treasury, and his reply has been sent to the Committee on Ways and Means. It is perfectly patent, therefore, that the proper instrument of this House to make the investigation, if an investigation is to be made, is the Committee on Ways and Means; and the only question is whether or not the report of the Committee on Rules sending this matter to the Committee on Ways and Means ought to be adopted.

But our friends on the other side of the House seize this as a pretext to renew a charge made against the Secretary of the Treasury that has been answered over and over again, and by nobody better answered than by some of the most prominent Democrats in this House and in the country. These charges that gentlemen repeat here to-day have been, as I say, replied to fully. For instance, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] who has just yielded the floor has shown most conclusively that under the law no change will be made in the taxation of this property by reason of this transaction.

So far as the last charge made by the gentleman from Tennessee is concerned, that this national bank is buying property that it has no right to buy, I will say that the purchase of this property was authorized by the act that authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make the sale.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. In order to save time, I would like to know whether it is now in order to move, as an amendment or otherwise, that the House now adopt this resolution for an investigation without referring it to the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

The question being taken, the report of the Committee on Rules was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MILITARY HOSPITAL, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use $100,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

> Whereas the appropriation for the construction and repair of hospitals in the act making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, was increased $100,000 over the original estimate for the purpose of using that amount, or so much thereof as might be necessary, for the erection of a modern hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; and
> Whereas no specific reference to the place was made in said act: Therefore be it
> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to use the sum of $100,000 out of the amount appropriated for the construction and repair of hospitals mentioned in said act, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction of a modern military post hospital at the said Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to use $100,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans."

The Committee on Military Affairs recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 1, after the words "Secretary of," strike out the words "the Treasury" and insert the word "War."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Before unanimous consent is granted, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas what is the necessity for this unusual proceeding in the way of an appropriation?

Mr. CURTIS. The matter, Mr. Speaker, was fully explained to the House on Saturday last. It was then stated that a hearing was had before the Committee on Military Affairs, and the estimate was increased by the sum of $100,000 in order that the money might be used for that purpose. It was then distinctly understood that so much as might be necessary was to be expended to build a hospital at Fort Leavenworth. The money was set aside at the Department, but upon an investigation it was found that without the location being specifically named in the bill the law limited the Department to the expenditure of $20,000 for this purpose.

The matter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they had a full and thorough hearing, and increased the appropriation originally made $100,000 more for this purpose. But under the law, as I have stated, they found that they were limited to the expenditure of $20,000 under the circumstances.

The Surgeon-General asked for the introduction of this resolution, and asked the use of $100,000 for the purpose contemplated here. The matter is set out fully and thoroughly in the report, and it shows without question that this appropriation should be used for the purpose contemplated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You provided an appropriation of $100,000 originally and found that you could only appropriate $20,000 under the law?

Mr. CURTIS. That is correct.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then this is simply to correct a serious mistake of the Military Committee in appropriating money they had no authority to appropriate?

Mr. CURTIS. It is not a mistake, Mr. Speaker. It was simply an oversight of the Department. It was found after the authorization was given that they were limited to $20,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, I said it was a mistake. An oversight is a mistake at times, is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. That may be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken on the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the words "one hundred thousand dollars" in the resolution and inserting in lieu thereof the words "sixty thousand dollars."

In this connection I wish to call the attention of the House to the letter from the Surgeon-General, which is made a part of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with the bill. This letter bears date November 27, 1899, and after referring to the appropriation for the construction and the repair of hospitals, goes on to say:

In my opinion the amount mentioned will not be necessary, and it is probable that an entirely satisfactory post hospital of 50 beds can be erected for $60,000.

I think the gentleman from Kansas will agree with me that the appropriation should be reduced to $60,000.

Mr. CURTIS. I would rather it would be made $75,000, because I doubt very much whether they can build a 50-bed hospital for $60,000; but I will consent to $60,000 rather than have any controversy about it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Then I understand the amendment is agreed to, so far as it can be by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. Now, I want to say one word more upon the subject, not for the purpose of entering into any controversy, but simply for the purpose of challenging the action of the Committee on Military Affairs upon this subject-matter.

It is perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the jurisdiction to consider this proposition was with the Committee on Appropriations. It is a jurisdiction which that committee has exercised since the fiscal year 1879, without challenge, and with little, if any, objection or exception. I do not expect the Chair to rule upon this question, and I do not want to precipitate it into the debate to the detriment of this bill, which I think ought to pass at this time; but I do not wish this action to proceed without challenge. Whenever it may be quoted, it ought to be quoted with the understanding that the Committee on Appropriations questions the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs to deal with this subject-matter. I do not expect that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will agree to that, and I do not want to precipitate an extended debate. I simply want it put upon record that we protest.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, a very brief review of the way in which this appropriation came in. Before the appropriation bills were distributed among the different committees of the House the appropriation for hospitals and hospital supplies was always carried in the Army bill. It has been carried in the Army bill ever since the distribution among the different committees of the House.

For the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, in the hearings before the committee, the Surgeon-General stated that $100,000 would be profitably used in the construction of a new hospital urgently needed at Fort Leavenworth. We have never adopted the rule of apportioning this sum, no matter what it might be, to the different hospitals, believing that the Department could better apportion it than could the committee.

We appropriate a lump sum. In figuring for this fiscal year we took the amount the Surgeon-General stated was necessary, including $100,000 for the hospital at Fort Leavenworth, and at his request did not state that so much of it should be used at Fort Leavenworth, on his statement that he wanted the increased amount for the purpose of building a hospital there. In the case of Hot Springs, Ark., we specifically provided that $25,000 should be used at that place. We have had jurisdiction of this question from the beginning.

The Surgeon-General himself and the committee had overlooked a law of a great many years' standing, that unless specifically provided in the apportionment of the sum to hospitals not more than $20,000 could be apportioned to any one hospital, and this resolution is simply to cure the defect in the Army bill of this fiscal year. If we had inserted in it a provision that $100,000 shall be used for the hospital at Fort Leavenworth, it would have cured it. The resolution simply does that. As to the question of jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, we can meet that when it comes up; but I certainly protest against the protest of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. I desire to offer, at the end of line 7, the following amendment:

And the limit of cost of said hospital is fixed at said sum.

We ought to know what the cost of this article is to be, and it is customary in public-building bills to fix the limit of cost. That is not done by this bill, so I propose to add it at the end of this line.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the gentleman will not offer that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment before it is discussed, so that the House will understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 7, on page 2, insert "and the limit of cost of said hospital is fixed at said sum."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. The title should be amended, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that the preamble should be stricken out.

Mr. CURTIS. That has been done, as I understand it, by the adoption of the committee amendments.

Mr. McRAE. It is not indicated in the print which I have.

The SPEAKER. The preamble is still retained in the resolution.

Mr. McRAE. I move to amend by striking it out.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the title be amended and that the preamble be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the preamble be stricken from the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to the fact that as the sum in the bill has been changed there should be a change in the title to correspond with that. Without objection, there will be a change to correspond with the amendments which have been agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York call for the regular order?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. WEAVER. This is only a resolution authorizing the committee to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withdraw the demand for the regular order at the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws the demand for the regular order, and the Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2, be permitted to sit during sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, which is the call of committees. The Clerk will report the first committee.

LICENSES OF MASTERS, ENGINEERS, AND PILOTS.

Mr. SMALL (when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask for consideration of the bill (H. R. 1040) to amend section 4445 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the licensing of officers of steam vessels.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4445 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following paragraphs:

"Every applicant for license as either master, mate, pilot, or engineer under the provisions of this title shall make and subscribe to an oath or affirmation, before one of the inspectors referred to in this title, to the truth of all the statements set forth in his application for such license.

"Any person who shall make or subscribe to any oath or affirmation authorized in this title and knowing the same to be false shall be deemed guilty of perjury.

"Every licensed master, mate, pilot, or engineer who shall change, by addition, interpolation, or erasure of any kind, any certificate or license issued by any inspector or inspectors referred to in this title shall, for every such offense, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $500 and by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding three years."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The object of this bill, as appears from the reading of it, is twofold. The first two paragraphs of the bill are intended to remedy an existing evil. At present applicants for licenses as master, mate, engineer, or pilot are required to make application in writing to the inspectors of vessels of the district to which they belong; and for the information of the House I will read from an application for license, so that the House may see the importance of the same with reference to the license which is to be granted. The applicant is required to state the place of his birth, whether naturalized, his place of residence, and also to—submit the following statement of my experience and testimonials of character and qualifications. * * *

And I further say that I have not made application to the inspectors of any other district and been rejected within twelve months before the date of this application.

The form requires it to be sworn to, but there is no existing provision of law which requires the oath. This bill makes it necessary and makes it perjury if a false oath be taken. There have been numerous instances in United States courts where engineers, pilots, and masters have been under indictment for making false statements in this application; but by reason of the fact that there was no law requiring such an oath to be taken, the indictment for making a false statement has failed. A report from the Attorney-General, embodied in the report of the committee, goes into the matter fully and shows that there is no existing law for this oath; and therefore it is not a violation of law to make a false oath in the applications which are required to be made.

The next provision of the bill is intended to remedy another evil. It has frequently been the case, where masters, engineers, and pilots make an application for these licenses and have had them granted, that they, by interpolation, erasure, and otherwise, changed the license and thus perpetrated a fraud upon the steamboat service. There is no existing provision of law punishing this for forgery, so that the remaining provision of the bill provides that such "addition, interpolation, or erasure of any kind" shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 and by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding three years.

It was suggested a few days ago by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER], when it was attempted to call this bill up by unanimous consent, that the punishment imposed for this offense was unusual and severe. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is a minimum punishment for forgery in comparison with the penalty for forgeries of different kinds as provided in the Revised Statutes, as I have ascertained by an examination of the statutes, which I can demonstrate if any gentleman desires further information. This it a meritorious bill in every respect. It is intended to improve the service. It is intended to render more secure human life; and there is no section of the country, no matter how remote it is from the waterways, that is not interested in this bill. In addition to having the unanimous report of the committee, it is recommended by the organizations of the masters, pilots, and engineers throughout the country.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the law does not provide now for the examination of every man who is an applicant for pilot as to his qualifications, and has not he to go before a board for examination as to color blindness and everything of that kind? Why there is necessity for any additional requirements I do not understand.

Mr. SMALL. I will state, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky, that I understand the examination to which he has referred, but such examination does not cover the objects of this bill, because in the consideration of the applicant's written application he is required to give a statement of his experience and testimonials of character and qualification, which necessarily to a large extent governs the granting of his application.

Mr. BERRY. I understand that masters, pilots, and engineers of all steam vessels have a license from the inspector. I know that is true.

Mr. SMALL. In the application vital information is called for of which the applicant has exclusive knowledge, and which relates to the past life and personal record of the applicant, a knowledge of which is absolutely essential in determining his fitness for such a responsible position. Now, that is a matter of which the inspectors are necessarily ignorant, and which necessarily must enter as an important factor in arriving at the conclusion as to whether the man should have his license. The man may be an entire stranger to them, and as a usual thing the examination, which is ordinarily oral, is only for the purpose of ascertaining the mental qualifications and knowledge of the applicant. An engineer, for instance, may be mentally a bright man and yet make a very unsafe engineer, because he may lack character and experience.

Mr. BERRY. I understand that the applications have to be in writing?

Mr. SMALL. They are written and sworn to.

Mr. BERRY. But are they not written and are they not examined by members of this board, except as to color, where they have to use skeins of yarn for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are color blind or not?

Mr. SMALL. The applications are in writing; but there is no provision of law by which they must be sworn to, no provision of law which makes a false oath perjury.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to know why it is any more necessary for a man to swear to his answers upon examinations such as these than for a man to swear to his answers upon a civil-service examination.

Mr. SMALL. The difference is that these are engineers and pilots. They control the passenger and freight steamers and have under their control property and human life. It is necessary that they should be men of character and experience. Mere mental qualifications are not all that is required in order that they should discharge the important and responsible duties devolving upon them.

Mr. BERRY. I have seen many of these examinations in which the parties are required to give the tensile strength of iron and what amount of pressure there would be with a certain amount of steam and other practical questions. Then, again, those being examined as pilots are asked questions about the river and its obstructions; or, if the question be ocean navigation, they are asked corresponding questions in regard to that subject. But why men should swear to their answers under such circumstances I do not understand.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the object sought to be attained by this bill. With some modifications the measure ought to become a law. I have in my district several very large rivers, and a great number of crafts ply those rivers. I am somewhat familiar with the character of the individuals who are masters, mates, pilots, and engineers on board those crafts. The objection that I made to this measure a few days since was that the punishment provided was too severe. I desire now to give the House a brief account of this matter for the benefit of those who have no navigable waters in their district and who may know nothing of the character of the citizens who will be affected by this measure.

On the inland waters of the United States we have crafts corresponding, it may be said, with the traffic vehicles in our great cities. The difference between a great number of our smaller crafts as compared with the great steamboats plying those rivers is about as marked as the difference between the ordinary traffic vehicle of a city and our great street-car lines. If this bill be modified so as to make it apply only to those steamers that make it a business to carry passengers, I would have no objection. But, sir, take the Ohio or the Mississippi River. There may be some man who has earned his living on the river managing a skiff, or running a ferry, or something of that sort, who, having got together five or six hundred dollars, buys a little scow-bottomed tug or some similar craft. He proposes to ply that little steamer perhaps over a course of 40 or 50 miles up and down the river. He is familiar with the channel. It requires no very great knowledge of seamanship to manage such craft.

That man, we will suppose, applies for a license as master, mate, pilot, and engineer, all in one. The very great probability is that he is an ignorant man, has had no experience generally in river matters. He makes his application before the inspectors. Gentlemen will understand that the country is divided into inspection districts, one inspection district embracing perhaps Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, and Indiana. The board of inspectors, we will suppose, sits at Cincinnati, and the applicant may have to go two or three hundred miles away from home to make his application. Now, this man owning a very small craft will make application before these inspectors for a license to authorize him to manage his own craft. Perhaps he does not carry five passengers in twelve months. The range of his navigation is not over 50 miles.

Now, for a misstatement which he may make as to his experience on the river this bill proposes a maximum fine of $500 and imprisonment for three years in the penitentiary. I think these penalties are too severe. Certainly a man should be punished for making a false statement; and if this provision applied only to steamers carrying hundreds of passengers I would be in favor of it. But to send to the penitentiary every man who may make a false statement in his application for license to navigate one of these small crafts would be, in my opinion, a very great hardship. Now, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] whether he will not consent to an amendment to the effect that the provisions of this bill shall apply only to steamers of more than 150 tons burden. If he will consent to such a modification, or will consent to modify the penalties as I have suggested, I will withdraw all opposition to the measure.

Mr. SMALL. I will not consent to such an amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will you consent to an amendment making the provisions of the bill applicable only to steamers of over 150 tons burden?

Mr. SMALL. We can not.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a great injustice upon many citizens of this country to pass such a bill as this. There is no doubt in the world that many of these little steamers that perhaps would carry, as I say, 20 or 50 passengers in a year—whose master, pilot, and mate are all one man—to subject them to the penalties and fines, and so forth, in this bill, would be an injustice. If it applied solely to passenger steamers nobody would object; but, for instance, we will take this case: Any man living in a river district knows the character of individual who generally acts as mate on board one of these steamers. His entire duty consists in managing a lot of negroes. He is not required to know anything about navigation, he has nothing to do with the management of the craft, except in the event that the captain, all of the clerks, and the pilot are disabled. Yet this man, generally a man of the densest ignorance, whose only requisite is that he possesses bulldog courage and great tenacity, is subject to the operation of this measure. You propose to send him to the penitentiary for three years and fine him $500.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] such time as he desires.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I was recognized only for the purpose of debating this measure. Would it be proper at this time to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not when the gentleman was yielded to solely for the purpose of debate. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] controls the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] will give me a little attention he will not desire to make either one of the amendments that he has proposed.

Now, in the first place, if this was a proposition to consign every man who violates this law to imprisonment for three years or to be fined $500, there would be great force in the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER]. But the provision of the bill commits the whole question of the penalty to the judgment of the court. An offender is not to be imprisoned longer than three years. There is no minimum time. The judge might sentence him to twenty-four hours' imprisonment, and the same is true of the fine.

Shall be fined not more than $500.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman represents a river district, does he not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not know the character of individuals who generally act as mates?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will come to that.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think it to be best to brand a man of that kind as a felon and send him to the penitentiary for even two hours for making a misstatement connected with his avocation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will cheerfully give my views to the House. The next point made by the gentleman is that there are certain small craft in the rivers, conspicuously in the rivers that I represent in part, and which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] more fully represents, where the master, the mate, the pilot, and the engineer, perhaps, are all in one person. They carry, perhaps, only a few passengers during the year. They do carry their crew, whatever that may be, small or large; but the difficulty is this, if one of those men can procure a license, then he is liable to make his appearance on one of the great steamers of the river.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman on that. The character of license, the amount of steam, the number of passengers that are proposed to be carried, and all that, are regulated in the license issued to the man.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all true enough, but the difficulty lies in the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] does not, I imagine, appreciate the purpose of this bill.

It came to the knowledge of the committee, from the Treasury Department, that these masters, mates, pilots, and engineers will file written statements of the employment that they have had, stating that they had been employed under the auspices of some of the great navigation companies, speaking of the ships on which they had been employed, stating the length of time they have served in the various branches; and when the matter has been investigated, it has been found repeatedly that many of these men have never had any license for any such purpose, have never served in any such capacity; and then when the Treasury Department begin to look around they discover that there is no law to give any relief whatever except to revoke the license of the person so guilty of fraud.

It is not a little thing for a pilot to make a written statement that he knows how to steer a steamship across the Atlantic Ocean or a steamboat down the Ohio River, and then, when he has wrecked her upon a rock or run her into a bank on a dark night, that it shall be determined that the representation upon which he secured his license was absolutely false.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will not the gentleman agree with me in this statement, that there is no pilot on the Ohio River who ever runs a craft a greater distance than 100 or 150 miles where the craft does not exceed 150 tons burden?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is quite likely, but does the gentleman propose to do anything to endanger human life by a refusal to compel a statement from the applicant which shall be under oath?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am for the bill. I want the measure to become a law, if the gentleman will pardon me, but I want to see it amended.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What possible objection is there, then, to treating a man's statement as perjury if he makes misstatements under oath?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon me, he represents a river district, and he knows that there are innumerable craft that carry practically no passengers plying up and down the river, and he is going to leave it in the power of the court to inflict the maximum penalty in cases of that kind. I know the gentleman has practiced before the Federal courts enough to know that they generally impose pretty heavy penalties, and here is a proposition which will allow the imposing of a maximum penalty on men who stand in about the same position to the great lines of common carriers that the hack drivers do in cities. I want to exempt them and let the bill reach the big fellows.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not willing to exempt them. I think when Congress comes to legislate for the purpose of protecting passengers upon an ocean steamship, or upon a palatial steamship on the Ohio River, that Congress is just as much bound to legislate to protect the humblest member of the crew on a little vessel as to protect anybody else.

And I can see no reason why the applicant, in the case of a small vessel, should not give his statement under oath, the same as anybody else. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] to meet this proposition: Why require a license, why require an inspection, why require an examination at all if it has not been the policy of the law to treat all the engines and boilers and hulls upon an equality of right? It is not necessary for the navigator of one of these small vessels to state in his application that he is capable of steering his boat through the intricacies of the Mississippi River or the Missouri River, but it is necessary for him to tell the truth, and that is all we ask in this bill.

We do not add anything to his burden. We do not say the men upon these little crafts must do something which they never had to do before. They have always had to make this application. We simply say to them, "When you make your application you must tell the truth, and if you do not tell the truth you shall be punished for it." Now, so far as the penalty is concerned, I certainly think that to sentence a man to prison for three years for perjury may or may not be a hardship. I do not know that because a man swears to a lie about a little steamship he is guilty of any less moral turpitude than though it was a magnificent ocean liner.

I think it is all the same. The whole thing is left to the discretion of the court. He may fine; he may imprison. I would be entirely willing to consent, as an individual member of this committee, to one modification or amendment, inserting the word "or" where the word "and" occurs in the penalty clause. That would give to the judge of the court the power to inflict a mere nominal fine, if, in his judgment, the defendant had only nominally and perhaps unintentionally violated the law.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I think that would be a good amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would be entirely willing to do that. In other respects I think the bill ought to be passed as it is. I will say that this bill excludes nobody from the service who is competent to go into the service, and all that it demands is that those who shall obtain licenses of this character shall tell the truth.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Was there anything like a demand from the river interests of the United States for a measure of this sort?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There was a strong representation from the Masters, Pilots, and Engineers' Association, and the gentleman from North Carolina, representing a different section of the country, presents also a strong request from there. The gentleman from Wisconsin, too, has knowledge of the matter.

Mr. MINOR. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. MINOR. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the president of the Marine Engineers' Association of the United States prepared this bill by direction of the executive officers of that organization, and came before the committee representing the members of the organization in behalf of this bill. I want to say to him that it is indorsed by the licensed masters of this country, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman would make inquiry in his own district, upon the rivers to which he refers, he would find that the very men that he seeks to protect are in favor of this bill, because I believe they are members of these organizations.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I do not want to take up any more time of the gentleman.

Mr. MINOR. And I do not want to inject a speech in his [Mr. GROSVENOR's] time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield the gentleman time.

Mr. MINOR. I want to say to the gentleman that I myself hold a license as master of steam vessels, with many years' experience. I am also an honorary member of the Marine Engineers' Association of the United States; and I want to say that these two organizations come here and unanimously demand the elevation of that service by preventing fraud in procuring licenses. Listen for a moment to what the Supervising Inspector-General, James A. Dumont, says:

> I have the honor to report thereon that the object of the bill is to provide a legal means of preventing fraud in obtaining licenses by persons applying for license as steamboat officers, and for punishing officers who, after receiving licenses, fraudulently and by forgery increase, by interlineation or otherwise, the conditions originally stated on the face of such licenses.

I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, if he represents river men in his State that have been guilty of changing the face of the licenses there by raising them, authorizing them to navigate or operate machinery for larger ships, that it is just as much a crime and just as much an offense as if it were on the Atlantic Ocean or Lake Michigan. A lie well told and well sworn to on board a craft of 50 or 100 tons is just as serious and just as offensive as one sworn to on a craft that carries a thousand tons.

I know something about these river craft that he speaks about. A man possesses a little craft and is the engineer, master, and pilot himself. Every Sunday, unless it is an exception down in the gentleman's moral district, they are probably run on excursions up and down the river by men who have no business to have this license; and if they are run by men who have interlined this license and changed the original conditions, they ought to be punished as the bill provides; and I think that with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, to substitute the word "or" for the word "and," the bill ought to pass.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Pilots' Association had adopted this bill?

Mr. MINOR. The Pilots' Association, so far as I know, yes; and, so far as my personal knowledge goes, all these marine associations have adopted it for the purpose of rooting out these fraudulent parties.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact that the second section of the bill is legislation against the crime of forgery. Now, I assume that the gentleman will admit that because the vessel is a small one it is no less a crime to commit forgery to obtain a license to operate that vessel than it would be if it were a large vessel. Now, surely the gentleman will not attempt to palliate the crime of forgery because the pilot is trying to forge his way from one small vessel to perhaps one of larger dimensions.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No; I think that provision ought to stand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the penalty on the other branch is simply the penalty of perjury.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I hope I may have some time on this question.

Mr. BERRY. Is there not law enough now to punish a man who changes or interlines his license?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should have thought so if the Attorney-General of the United States had not said to the contrary.

Mr. BERRY. I observe the statement of the Attorney-General; but does not the gentleman from Ohio, as a lawyer, believe that if a man takes a license issued by the United States and interlines it in order to give himself a higher grade of license than was really granted him, he is guilty of forgery?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am willing that the gentleman shall put his opinion as a lawyer here against that of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BERRY. I am asking the gentleman the question. He is a distinguished lawyer, one of the best in Ohio. I supposed he could give me that information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should have thought that a license is a public record, and that an alteration of it would be forgery. But it having been decided, apparently by very high authority, that there is no law to punish such an offense, certainly the legislative department ought to meet the case by making the law explicit, as we had supposed it to be before this decision was made.

Mr. BERRY. I do not know, but I think there are some gentlemen in this House who are just as good lawyers as many gentlemen who have acted as Attorney-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At any rate, it having gone forth to the business interests of the country that there is no law to punish that sort of a change of record, I should not hesitate to make the law specific by the passage of an act of Congress.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Speaker, in some cases which have come before the courts it has been found that the local steamboat inspectors have never been invested with authority to administer oaths except in cases of investigation.

Mr. BERRY. I take it that when a man presents himself for license under the laws of the United States he is subjected to a very rigid and thorough examination. Now, why should such a man, any more than a person applying for any other position, be held responsible in the future? Ought not the Government of the United States to satisfy itself by proper examination that the person is suitable for the position?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to say that the statement here in question is a representation as to the person's experience, where he has been employed, what he has been doing, etc. That statement the law ought to require to be verified by oath.

Mr. BERRY. A man applying for a position as engineer is asked certain questions, such as, Supposing the boiler space so much and there is so much space at the valve and the steam is brought to bear upon the engine, how much will be the pressure per square inch? Questions of that difficult and intricate nature are propounded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, we have had this same provision for I do not know how many years, and the only difficulty now is that there is no penalty for a false statement. A man is now required by law to make that statement.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is it not the law to-day—has it not always been the law—that where a man makes a false statement in his application for increased grade as pilot, master, or engineer, the board may not only refuse the application for an increase of grade, but may cancel the license he already holds?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the only remedy.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does the gentleman want anything severer?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir; I want something a good deal more severe. If a pilot makes a false statement that he is familiar with the Ohio River and afterwards, in consequence of his unfamiliarity, steers his boat upon the head of the falls and a number of passengers are drowned, I want him sent to the penitentiary for having falsely stated that he had had experience upon those waters.

Mr. PAYNE. Allow me to state that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] helped to frame the original law some two or three years ago requiring these statements to be made.

Mr. BERRY. I recollect that the bill was considered by our committee, but I never agreed to the proposition that a man should be put under oath upon every matter as to which the Government may examine him.

The gentleman from Ohio says that an incompetent pilot may run his boat upon the falls. Now, one of the very questions they would ask a man under such circumstances would be, What direction would you take at that particular point; what lights would you follow? and so forth; and unless those questions were answered satisfactorily he would not get his license.

Mr. PAYNE. The law already requires this statement to be made. This bill simply proposes to add the provision that it shall be made in the form of an oath and subject to the penalties of perjury.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio will understand that granting a man a license does not guarantee him employment at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course not.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, all those employed as the working force of a vessel are generally known to the inspectors. As I have said, the mere fact that a man is licensed by the inspector does not insure his getting employment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why should he be licensed at all? Why not let everyone in?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am coming to that point.

I would license him, simply because the Government, in its efforts to protect human life, has sought to obtain the highest skill possible in the management of a boat; but when the Government has exhausted its efforts to procure the skill, then the energy of the individual citizen comes in, and the owner of the craft exercises his right of selection from the vast number of pilots, masters, and engineers whom it is possible to employ, and the revocation of the license by the Government inspector and the deprivation of the opportunities to make a living, it occurs to me, is a sufficient punishment to any man for misrepresentation of the facts, especially these little fellows.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman and I differ about "these little fellows." I believe perjury to be perjury. I believe forgery to be forgery.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I do not propose to defend perjury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The defense that was once made in another case, as to the size of the offspring, I think has great force here.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am willing to differ with the gentleman even there, because I think that perjury upon the part of the gentleman from Ohio or myself would be a graver and more heinous offense than perjury on the part of a very ignorant man, unacquainted with the ordinary rules of legal procedure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say that, too; and I think if either one of us committed perjury, we ought to be sent to the penitentiary for three years and be fined $500. I can imagine a man who might commit perjury whom, if I were the judge on the bench, I would fine a dollar and tell him not to do it again.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. All the Federal judges are not so charitable as the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know. I think the Federal judges are very good judges on that very question. Not very long ago in the case of a young man who had committed a depredation upon the Post-Office Department, who was shown to have been of previous good character and to belong to a good family, who had never done anything of the kind before, it was a great satisfaction to me that a Federal judge gave him a mere nominal punishment, and I think saved him from the ultimate category of the criminal.

Mr. BERRY. Would the gentleman object to this bill lying over for a day or two until I can confer with gentlemen who live along the Ohio River?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We will never get to it again, probably, if that is done. We had better pass it now. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield back the time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of information to the House and for the purpose of answering an inquiry, I will state that section 4445 of the Revised Statutes, which this bill seeks to amend, reads as follows:

> Every master, chief mate, engineer, and pilot who receives a license shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath before one of the inspectors herein provided for, to be recorded with the certificate, that he will faithfully and honestly, according to his best skill and judgment, without concealment or reservation, perform all the duties required of him by law.

That is the extent of the section which is sought to be amended, and the oath which has been administered by inspectors to applicants for license has been simply a matter of regulation of the board of inspectors, and not a requirement of law, and this section seeks to make this provision mandatory, to recognize it by law. I take it that that information will answer several objections which have been made to this bill.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MINOR] if he desires to be heard further.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have anything further to say. It seems to me that this matter is too plain to need any further argument. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] proposes to except from the provisions of this bill craft of 150 tons burden. I want to say to the gentleman that there are millions and millions of dollars invested in tug property on the Great Lakes, and on board those tugs are thousands of employees, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky should prevail every tug would be exempt from the provision of this act, and the captains of those boats would have the glorious privilege of going before the inspectors and telling a lie and swearing to it and be beyond the reach of punishment, while if I was engaged in sailing a steamer carrying passengers I must tell the truth or go to State prison. It seems to me that that is clearly a malicious distinction and a piece of class legislation that I can not indorse.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the chairman of this great Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, proposes to accept an amendment inserting the word "or" in place of the word "and," and that in all conscience ought to satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] or any other gentleman in this House.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, does this bill come with a unanimous report from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. MINOR. It comes with a unanimous report, after having been fully discussed. The president of the United States Marine Engineers' Association presented their side of the case. I met a number of the engineers afterwards and they presented it to me, and every one of them asked me to urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. There was no division in the committee?

Mr. MINOR. Not at all; and no division anywhere, except down in Kentucky in some Congressional district.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD.]

Mr. LLOYD. I only want to ask a question. Perhaps the gentleman from North Carolina may be able to answer it. What is the penalty now for perjury, or what would be the penalty for perjury under this section?

Mr. SMALL. I can not answer that definitely.

Mr. LLOYD. As I understand this bill, it provides in one portion of it that if an individual subscribes to a false oath he shall be punished as for perjury as provided by the statute. It does not say what that punishment is, and I was only asking as a matter of information to know what was the penalty for perjury to which the individual would be liable under this section.

Mr. BERRY. Three years' imprisonment and $500 fine.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the maximum.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I should like to be recognized for a few moments to reply to something that has been said.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I should like to be recognized in my own right. I desire to offer an amendment at the conclusion of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] controls the floor for an hour.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman if he will yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment at the expiration of what I have to say.

Mr. SMALL. Is it the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. One is the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMALL. I yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to offer that amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman from Ohio if there had been any demand on the part of the engineers and masters in behalf of this bill, and I asked that question for the purpose of eliciting the reply which the gentleman made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] yielded only for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Kentucky to offer an amendment.

Mr. SMALL. I yielded three minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. With the right to offer his amendment?

Mr. SMALL. With the right to offer his amendment at the close of his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I can not say what I desire to say in three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I suppose five or ten minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman, with the right to offer an amendment at the close of his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The House will understand that these pilot associations are more or less close corporations. The high-grade pilots have organized themselves into a kind of association, which I do not object to. Their efforts, like the effort of all other organized bodies, is to draw the lines as closely as possible. So it is with the masters, so it is with the engineers. You will find kindred organizations among the railroad people of this country, and while I am not hostile to these organizations, while I, in fact, commend the purpose of them, at the same time I think it would be unwise for Congress to pass a bill that will strike down the honest endeavors of the little fellows who are trying honestly to support themselves.

Now, I do not propose to permit myself to be placed in the attitude of attempting to defend perjury or a willful violation of law. But I do insist that I have the right to protest against the creation of an offense and to denominate it perjury which has none of the elements of a criminal act. The law is amply sufficient now. You can revoke the license of these men who make false statements about their experience. And gentlemen take an erroneous view in saying that the Government watches as jealously the management and navigation of a little craft, having absolutely nobody aboard of it, perhaps, except one man, who is perhaps master, pilot, and engineer, and one roustabout, as it watches the management of the great Atlantic steamers or the floating palaces on the Mississippi and the Ohio River.

I have indicated that all objection would be withdrawn, so far as I was concerned, if the provisions of this bill were made to apply to steamers of 150 tons burden and upwards. I am perfectly willing that those steamers that carry passengers should be required to conform to the provisions of this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin, whose acquaintance I have not, undertakes to speak of the morality of my district as so great or something so peculiar to the people of Kentucky that I want this provision of the bill stricken out as to them! The morals of my district are not better or different from those of Wisconsin or any other district in the country, but of one thing I am assured—the people of the First district of Kentucky are too intelligent to select a man to represent them on the floor of Congress who can not debate a simple measure like this without trying to drag politics into it.

As the measure now stands, it is compulsory upon the trial judge to both fine and imprison the man. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has indicated that he is willing to substitute the disjunctive for the copulative conjunction and let him fine or imprison; and if the gentleman will yield for me to offer an amendment providing that the provisions of this bill shall apply only to steamers of 150 tons burden, or even 100 tons burden, I believe all objection would be withdrawn; but if the measure is pressed as it is, Mr. Speaker, I must insist that in my humble opinion the members of the House will impose a penalty for the violation of this provision that is far in excess of the offense. I am satisfied that if the rank and file of the river people of the United States could be heard from they would oppose this measure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What distinction is made now between the small vessel and the large vessel?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No distinction is made so far as the vessel is concerned.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, all that we ask for is only that the man who applies for a license on the small vessel shall tell the truth, just exactly the same as the one on the large vessel.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I concede that to be true. But I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio that those who are licensed to run these small craft never are men that hope to manage larger craft. And while the Government uses its diligence in trying to perfect the skill of the masters, pilots, and engineers, in every single case, they ought not to apply the same tests in the management of these small vessels that they do in the management of these great steamers and ocean liners.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Now, I desire to offer an amendment, in line 8, page 2, by striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or" in place thereof.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "dollars," strike out the word "and," and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire only to offer a few remark with reference to the contention upon the part of the gentleman from Kentucky that the punishment for forgery, as provided for in this bill, is excessive. The punishment provided is that a man shall be fined not exceeding $500, and that he should be imprisoned at hard labor for a term not exceeding three years. The Revised Statutes, section 5415, providing punishment for forging United States securities, says that he "be fined not more than $5,000 or be imprisoned not more than fifteen years." By section 5417 of the Revised Statutes forgery of certificate of entry shall be punished "by a fine of not more than $10,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than three years."

By section 5421 forging "a deed, power of attorney, order, certificate, or receipt, or other writing for the purpose of obtaining money or to defraud the United States," etc., is to be punished by imprisonment "at hard labor for a period of not less than one year, or shall be imprisoned not more than five years and fined not more than $1,000." In this bill, the object of which is to provide greater security for human life, the punishment for the crime of forgery is less than is provided by any section of the Revised Statutes to which I have referred.

The other objections to the bill I think have been fully answered, Mr. Speaker, and I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. LLOYD. I would like to call attention, if the gentleman will permit, to the penalty for perjury.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. It is to that part of it which states that an individual who violates his oath becomes guilty of the crime of perjury. Here is the law with reference to that:

SEC. 5392. Every person who, having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed is true, willfully and contrary to such oath states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000, and by imprisonment, at hard labor, not more than five years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed.

That provision, as will be observed, makes the penalty for perjury much stronger than that for forgery.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] desires to draw a distinction in this matter between smaller vessels and larger ones. The difficulty about that is that there would be constant controversy as to what class of vessel a man's license was taken out for—whether for a larger or a smaller vessel. There would be continual disturbance in the inspector's department as to the size of vessel for which a man had been licensed.

Now, while I have listened with great interest to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, I must say that I can see no distinction between a false statement made in order to become the master of a 100-ton vessel and a false statement made in order to become the master of a 200-ton vessel. This bill is one of the steps which the Supervising Inspector, General Dumont, has asked for in order that this system may be brought still further toward perfection than it has already reached.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as it seems desirable to put an end to this debate and give an opportunity for other gentlemen to call up their reports, I ask for the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I move to recommittee the bill with instructions to report it back with provisions making it apply only to vessels of 150 tons burden and over. And on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 15, noes 69.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I make the point that there is no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am under the impression that upon the count announced by the Speaker the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. There were 15 voting in the affirmative and 69 in the negative, making a total of 84, of which the necessary one-fifth would be 17.

The point of order is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair can not entertain that point of order. It is not a proper point.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. My point was not that no quorum had voted. I made the point that there was no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not entirely clear upon the matter, but will count the House to ascertain whether a quorum is present. [After a count.] One hundred and eighty-six members are present—a quorum. The yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky was rejected.

The bill as amended was then passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES WEATHER BUREAU.

The call of committees was proceeded with.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when the Committee on Agriculture was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House bill 3988, to organize and improve the United States Weather Bureau. I find that by some mistake the bill has been referred to the House Calendar instead of to the Union Calendar. I would like to have that mistake corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the ground of his request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill carries an increase of salary, although, in fact, it does not make an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order the transfer of the bill to the appropriate Calendar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The morning hour having expired, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 3988.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the morning hour has not expired; but an hour has expired since the call of committees began. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3988.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3988) to organize and improve the United States Weather Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill (H. R. 3988) to reorganize and improve the United States Weather Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH (interrupting the reading). I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill and that we take it up under the five-minute rule, section by section, unless some gentleman wishes to have general debate.

Mr. LOUD. That can not be done now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before consent is given to that, I think it would be better to have some general statement about the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], can give us a general idea of its provisions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman wants general debate on it, I am perfectly willing to have it on both sides.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My idea was that only in general debate can we have that full explanation of the features of the bill which every bill should receive. I am not speaking for everybody; I am only speaking for myself.

Mr. LOUD. We ought not to close general debate on this bill at all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the chairman of the committee reporting this bill [Mr. WADSWORTH] that I believe it is one which ought to be considered under general debate. For my part, I express that view and trust that will be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly willing that there should be general debate.

Mr. BROWN. It is a very important measure, and I think there ought to be a reasonable time given to debate before we come to the five-minute rule. I would suggest two hours.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that, that the general debate be limited to two hours. I move that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York amend his request to include the time for the termination of the general debate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do. I ask that it be limited to two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that general debate be limited to two hours.

Mr. LOUD. I would ask the gentleman to segregate the two requests. I have no objection to the first request, but general debate on this bill shall never be closed if I can prevent it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I insist on my request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Gentlemen on this side want some time for general debate, and I suggest to the gentleman that he proceed now in the usual form, and probably general debate can be closed inside of two hours, or later, if necessary. I think it would not be well to undertake to close it now in advance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Objection has been made by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] already.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. That was not objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, according to the report on this bill, which is ready for distribution, the bill aims to accomplish three objects which are practically departures from existing law. The first is the perpetuation by law of the present rigid system of discipline and merit obtaining in the Weather Bureau. That, I take it, no man on the floor of this House will object to. In support of that, I have received a great many resolutions passed by maritime and business associations and others. It is a Bureau which comes more directly and more closely in touch with the business interests of this country than any other bureau of this Government. So I do not care to discuss that part of the bill any further. I think that is a matter that we will all agree upon—any betterment of the service we will all uphold.

Passing to the second, the granting of authority to the employees of the Bureau to create, exclusively from their own moneys, a fund for the retirement of disabled and aged officials, this to be accomplished without one dollar of expense to the Federal Government, and in such a way that at no time in the future can the Federal Government be called upon to contribute anything in any manner to that fund.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will with pleasure.

Mr. HEPBURN. There has been some effort here at securing civil-service reform, I believe. I want to know if you have adoped the merit system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, will you tell us what it is?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We do not do away with the civil-service examination as now carried on. We simply change the manner of nominating to appointment, that is all. I think the gentleman himself is very familiar with the present civil-service examination system.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman, just at that point, yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My colleague [Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts], the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, has taken great interest in this bill and expected to be here during its discussion and to participate in it; but he has been called to Massachusetts to attend the funeral of a near relative, and consequently it has been impossible for him to say anything. An attempt was made to postpone its consideration, which attempt was unavailing. I make this brief statement simply to explain his absence at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question of the retirement fund, as I have said in the report, is a new departure; but I want to call to the attention of the House the fact that as provided for in this bill it is done without one dollar of expense to the Government, without any possibility of any future expense to the Government. It has been said here that if we authorize this the clerks will come here and form what might perhaps be called a labor union, and urge Congress to increase their salaries to the amount of the percentage deducted in order to form this retirement fund. But I do not know of any other way to get rid of the superannuated employees, men who have passed the time of useful service to the Government, who, by age or from other cause, have become partially or wholly disabled.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the bill provide for a voluntary fund or a compulsory fund?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A compulsory fund.

Mr. RIDGELY. That the money shall be taken out of the salary of every employee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Out of the salary of every employee in the Weather Bureau. Now, as a matter of fact, the Government to-day is actually pensioning a large class of clerks; it is in this way: They have passed beyond the age of utility from one cause or another. Through a feeling of charity and kindness, and sometimes through political influence, these old people are kept in office, and the result is that the Departments are continually asking for an increase of force to do the work of these old clerks who are still on the pay rolls. Therefore, these old people are practically pensioned to-day by the Government.

Mr. RIDGELY. How long does an employee have to pay into this fund before he is entitled to the benefits of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. At least ten years.

Mr. RIDGELY. I simply ask that in order that it may go into the RECORD.

Mr. BROMWELL. I should like to ask a question about this.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. A doubt which suggests itself to my mind is as to whether these figures will permit the payment of this pension to the earlier withdrawals. I can imagine that the fund might gradually accumulate until the provisions of the bill may be carried out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have the figures here, and I am going to produce them.

Mr. BROMWELL. Have these figures been prepared by an expert actuary or other person competent to give them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have been furnished by the Weather Bureau, based on the number of employees, the age of the employees, and the salaries paid.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is one element that comes in there; that is, the ten years. Then there is a provision in this bill for retirement on account of incapacity. Does not that specifically include those?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. In further answer to the gentleman from Ohio I have a statement here from the Weather Bureau showing the facts. It fixes the number of employees affected by the law at 654. The amount that will be paid annually to the retirement fund, at 3 per cent, under the present organization and appropriation, will be $18,000. Now, you take for the twelve years as an example, and the amount paid into the retirement fund will be $216,000. The amount credited to the fund in twelve years by death of retired employees, discharges, resignations, and other lapses, estimated in accordance with the record of past years, will amount to $14,000. That will make the total amount of revenues for twelve years $230,000.

Now, as to the expenses for twelve years from July 1, 1900, the date on which the retirements begin: During the first year 4 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them until June 30, 1912, will be $19,656; during the second year 1 employee will retire, and the amount required to pay him to June 30, 1912, will be $1,606; during the third year 2 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be, to June 30, 1912, $13,800: during the fourth year 2 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them to June 30, 1912, will be $16,859; during the fifth year 4 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $23,758; during the sixth year 2 will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $14,369; during the seventh year 6 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $18,193; during the eighth year 3 will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $10,568; during the ninth year 5 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $11,826; during the tenth year 7 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $15,751; during the eleventh year 3 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $4,894, and during the twelfth year 4 employees will retire, and the amount required to pay them will be $635.

So the expenses against the fund on account of deaths of employees not retired, retirements on account of disability, and incidental expenses for twelve years from July 1, 1900, will be $15,750, leaving a total expense of $167,665, leaving a credit balance on hand on June 30, 1912, of $62,335.

Mr. BROMWELL. Now may I ask the gentleman one further question? It may be in the bill, but I do not recollect seeing it. Is there a provision in this bill by which a person who resigns voluntarily inside of the limit of being entitled to this pension may recover a big percentage of the amount that he has paid into this fund, or is the entire amount that he has paid in forfeited? I presume there is a provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no provision of that kind in the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the gentleman from Ohio is the very inquiry I was going to make of the gentleman from New York. I would like to go a little further in my inquiry upon that point, so that he could answer both. What I desire to ask him is, as I understand the provisions of the bill——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me answer the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The section covering the provision where employees voluntarily leave the service is found on page 13 of the bill:

Provided, That in all cases where employees shall voluntarily leave the Government service or be removed therefrom for cause they shall forfeit to the retirement fund the amount of salary withheld under the provisions of this act.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, what I wanted to ask the gentleman was, if there ought not to be a distinction between an employee where he goes out of the service voluntarily and where he is discharged from the Weather Bureau. For instance, you take it that an employee is there, and perhaps he is quite efficient. He has been in the service possibly ten or fifteen years, and then, on account of his qualifications and his efficiency, he is promoted, not in that Bureau, but beyond that Bureau. Now, during all these ten or fifteen years——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will say to the gentleman this retirement fund only affects employees of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know it does. Now, during all these ten or fifteen years of this efficient employee's service in the Bureau there has been accumulated out of his salary so much, which would be to his credit if he were to die. I can see that it would be right if he was discharged for cause that it should be forfeited; but suppose on account of his efficiency, by reason of his qualifications and his merit, he is promoted to something better, not in this Bureau, but in some other bureau, why should he have that amount deducted from his salary during this ten or fifteen years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can only say that he leaves voluntarily; he was not forced to leave, and he was not forced into the service.

Mr. CANNON. He has had the benefit of being insured.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Am I not right in saying that when an employee leaves the service voluntarily or by discharge for cause he forfeits that which has been reserved from his salary?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman is partially right and partially wrong. This bill does not undertake to put anybody upon this retirement list unless he is at the time of his retirement an employee of the Weather Bureau. That far the gentleman is right. But if the man serves in the Weather Bureau and shall voluntarily leave or be transferred to some other department or goes out of the service altogether, and shall afterwards reenter the Bureau, then the time he had served during his first employment and the time of his service during the second employment are added together in order to get at the time of his employment; and if he shall reach the age of 60 prior to having served through the years fixed by the bill, then he shall draw at the rate of one-thirtieth for each year he had served. Suppose he serves fifteen years, he draws fifteen-thirtieths; and if the amount is $900, he would draw one-half of $900 and get $450.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, let me ask my friend a question there. Suppose that this employee is transferred because of his meritorious service, and he is invited to hold a higher position in some bureau or department and does not return to the Weather Bureau at any time? Now, it seems to me that portion of the bill should be amended so as to remedy that defect.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We thought we could not undertake—that, in fact, we had no jurisdiction as a committee—to report legislation relating to any other part of the public service than the Department of Agriculture. If a man voluntary retires from the Weather Bureau, so that he is no longer in its employmen, then, of course, this classification can not apply to him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course not; but, as I understand, immediately upon his divorcing himself from the Bureau by a transfer to some other bureau or department he forfeits whatever sum may have been accumulated for his benefit under this bill. In other words, it is assumed that he will not return to the Bureau, and whatever he may have contributed to this general fund, whatever may have accumulated there which would have gone to his benefit, is forfeited, and in the event of his death he receives no benefit from it.

Now, it seems to me that if he is an entirely meritorious officer, if he may have left the Bureau by reason of promotion to some higher grade of service, he ought not to lose the amount accumulated to his credit while he was an efficient employee of the Bureau. If some provision could be made by which at least a portion of this fund should accrue to his benefit, it seems to me the measure would come nearer meeting the merits of the case. I am inclined, however, to defer very largely to the views of the members of the Agricultural Committee, who have investigated and studied this bill more than I have, though I have paid some little attention to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Whenever a man is transferred to any other department, of course the transfer is voluntary; it is made upon his own request. I know no instance of any transfer except in that way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If any man voluntary resigns his place, he should not blame Congress if he loses the benefit of this provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But does not this put an embargo upon a man's undertaking to get a better place?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; not at all. If a man receiving from the Weather Bureau $900 sees an opportunity to obtain $1,200 in the War Department, for instance, the transfer is made at his own request; in other words, he prefers to give up the salary of $900, with the chances of retirement under a bill of this kind, and to accept the salary of $1,200 in another branch of the service. If he voluntarily makes that choice he ought not to receive the benefit of this provision as a Weather Bureau employee and at the same time receive the benefit of the advanced salary which he gains by the transfer to another department. It is a matter of choice with him whether he will take one or the other; he ought not to have the benefit of both.

Mr. TALBERT. I see by the report of the committee that this bill aims to accomplish three objects which are departures from the existing law. The second of these objects is thus stated in the report:

> The granting of authority to the employees of the Bureau to create, exclusively from their own moneys, a fund for the retirement of disabled and aged officials, this to be accomplished without one dollar of expense to the Federal Government, and in such a way that at no time in the future can the Federal Government be called on to contribute in any manner to the fund.

That all sounds very well and may be very proper; but is it not, in fact, an entering wedge to the establishment of a civil pension system—a system of pensioning a man after a certain term of employment in the civil service of the Government? Is not this an entering wedge in that direction? Will it not lead ultimately to that end?

There is another question I would like to ask.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me answer one question at a time. I do not think the bill will have any such tendency as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] apprehends. The system of retirement of employees upon a pension provided by themselves has been adopted by the Pennsylvania Railroad; it has been adopted in the Regular Army, where the soldier contributes monthly a small part of his pay for the maintenance of the Soldiers' Home. This is practically a life insurance association carried on by the contributions of the Bureau employees.

Mr. TALBERT. I am utterly opposed to anything like a system of civil-service pensions. Hence I ask, Would it not be possible for the employees of the Weather Bureau to establish this kind of a beneficial association for themselves, without any authority of law? Is it not a fact that in other departments of the Government there has been organized a kind of life insurance association among the employees similar to this, but without any authority of law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not believe that in the Weather Bureau an entirely voluntary system, without any legal authority, would be effective.

Mr. TALBERT. One effect of this measure, it seems to me, will be that these employees, after making these contributions to this insurance fund, will be clamoring for an increase of salary to make up to them the amount which they thus contribute. Thus this will practically amount to a system of civil-service pensions.

I think that if we undertake to carry out the object stated in the report as the second object of the measure the bill will operate as nothing more nor less than an entering wedge for establishing under this Government a system to which I am absolutely opposed. I am opposed to anything that smacks of civil-service pensions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So am I; but I do not think this "smacks" of it at all.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to call the attention of the House particularly to the point I have stated. I hope that any provisions of the bill which undertake to carry out what is stated in the report as the second object of the bill will be entirely eliminated.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to say a word in answer to the gentleman from South Carolina. I do not think there is any such danger as he suggests unless we ourselves create that danger hereafter. In the city of Cincinnati we have a civil-service list, as it were, for the police department; also for the fire department, and recently for the school-teachers. Those systems have been in operation with us for a number of years, but no such difficulty as the gentleman from South Carolina anticipates has arisen. No one entertains the objection that the fund raised by these different employees may grow to be a claim against the city or the State. That fund is made up entirely by voluntary assessment, just as is provided under this bill with reference to these Weather Bureau employees.

Mr. TALBERT. Is there not already in several of the Departments an arrangement which practically meets the same object that this bill undertakes to accomplish?

Mr. BROMWELL. I am not able to hear the gentleman's interruption. I only desire to say that I believe there is no danger in this pension scheme provided it be properly worked out so as to accomplish what we want to accomplish—that these pensions may be paid as they become due from this fund raised by the contributions of the employees.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] who is in charge of this bill one question. There is a provision here for the payment of 75 per cent of the amount paid in by those who die. I want to ask the gentleman what justice is there in discriminating between those who die in the service or those who withdraw voluntarily from the service—say, for instance, a lady clerk who withdraws to be married or a gentleman clerk to be transferred to one of the other departments—and a person who on charges is expelled? He has paid so much money into this fund.

Now, you may say that he is insured; and yet so it is with the man who dies. He is upon the same footing, so far as the amount of money that he has paid in is concerned, and it seems to me it is a matter of justice that some provision should be made for the payment of 75 per cent, or whatever it may be, of the amount paid in by those who voluntarily withdraw from the service, as well as those who die in the service before the retirement age. I should like to have the gentleman please explain why the distinction is made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the first place no man can partake of this retirement fund unless he has paid into the fund for ten years. Now, if he voluntarily leaves it, I do not see why he does not sever his whole connection with the fund. No one compels him to do it. He does it with his eyes open and as a matter of judgment. He also enters this employment voluntarily. Now, most people who die do so involuntarily.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, suppose an extreme case. Suppose a man serves over there nine years and three hundred and sixty-four days, and the powers that be bounce him——

Mr. WADSWORTH. For cause?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They may call it for cause; but in nine cases out of ten it is not, if you get to the bottom of it. But suppose they bounce him: then what becomes of the money that he has paid into the fund?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That goes into the general fund.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He never gets any of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not if he is dismissed for cause.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, under this whole civil-service business, from top to bottom of it now, as I understand, any officer of the Government can bounce any one of those employees and say it is for cause, and the man has no redress. Is not that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That has nothing to do with this bill. I am not going to discuss general civil-service rules with the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, and I do not want to discuss civil-service rules. I will take occasion to do that some other time. Now, another question: Have the mathematicians of this committee ciphered on this proposition to see whether this per cent that they subtract from the salaries of these people and pay into this fund will produce enough revenue to pay these pensions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have, and I gave the figures to the House only a few minutes ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have ciphered that out satisfactorily, have you?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I want to say that I have not "ciphered" it out myself, but the figures have been produced from the Weather Bureau, based on the number of employees, the salaries paid, the amount which it will yield, and the estimated number of retirements.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, one question more. I am seeking information. Is or is not the provision in this bill to pension these men a part of the general proposition that is pending here in some shape or other—I do not know exactly what condition it has got into—to establish a general pension roll by reason of old age or other infirmities for all of the civil employees of the Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think there is such a bill pending before the Civil-Service Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know there is a bill pending, and I do not know how far along it has got; but I am asking you, Is the provision in this bill a part of that general scheme or not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it is not. It is entirely separate and only affects the Weather Bureau. That Bureau is a part of the Agricultural Department, but it is almost a department by itself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman does not doubt that the system, if it applies here, will eventually apply to all employees of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope it will eventually, but I am anxious to consider this bill entirely by itself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But if it is a good thing, why can not these employees establish it without the sanction of law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not believe that can be done. I do not believe you can get a unanimous judgment upon it among all the employees. Besides that, you have got to give them a charter, just as a State charters a fire insurance company or a life insurance company. Those things are regulated by laws.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the Government, then, is going into this business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; and a State government does not go into the fire insurance business when it gives a charter to a fire insurance company.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the Government, in this law, undertakes to regulate the terms upon which this money shall be paid in and out——

Mr. WADSWORTH. So does a State law which gives a charter to a fire insurance company.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the real purpose seems to be to pension persons who have been in the service a long time and who can not now be gotten rid of.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I see there are three subdivisions of this report, the first speaking of the perpetuation of the rigid system of discipline and merit; the second, which relates to what, for the purpose of my question, I will call the pensioning of the employees; and third, the apportionment of the labor. Now, I can not get hold of the framework of this bill as readily as I can ask the gentleman the question. Is this bill drafted so that all that portion which relates to this civil-pension part of it can be stricken out and leave the bill competent for the other two purposes that the report speaks of?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it is so constituted; but I want to say that the committee never drafted it with any such idea.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They reported it, however, for the action of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They did, and they will abide by that action very cheerfully.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GRIGGS. Would not the employees of this Bureau have the authority to establish this fund themselves without the special authority given them by this act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would only be by voluntary action, and you know how difficult it would be to secure such action among 600 employees scattered all over the country.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman is aware, of course, of the association of railway mail clerks, is he not, the chief feature of which is an insurance against accidents?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. Could not these employees in this Department establish an organization of that character and for that purpose?

Mr. TALBERT. They have it in other Departments, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is not the railway mail clerks' organization chartered under the power of some State law?

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not know whether it is chartered at all. It is simply a voluntary association of clerks for the purpose of insuring themselves against accident.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All these voluntary associations have to have charters. Now, the question is asked, Why should the law be specially made with reference to these clerks in this Bureau——

Mr. GRIGGS. It is the entering wedge for establishing the system in all the Departments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why should not Congress give them the authority? They are employees of the Government, and the authority for their employment comes from Congress.

Mr. GRIGGS. Why should the Government go out of the banking business and now at once go into the insurance business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will not attempt to answer that question.

Mr. THROPP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THROPP]?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. THROPP. Do I understand the gentleman frankly to admit that this is the first step or the entering wedge toward establishing a civil service pension system under this Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not admit that; I deny that emphatically.

Mr. GRIGGS. Did not the gentleman say he thought it would eventually prevail in all the Departments, and that he favored that system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under these same rules and regulations, without one cent of cost to the United States Government.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the purport of this bill, it provides for practically the retirement of all employees at the end of thirty years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; at the age of 65 years.

Mr. MANN. At the age of 65 years; but if not 65, then after thirty years' service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may be retired at that time, but after 65 it is compulsory.

Mr. MANN. At the end of thirty years they may be retired on 75 per cent of their average salary for the last five years of their service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which, of course, is a practical inducement to retire and to provide for the retirement fund to pay all these people, it is proposed to segregate 3 per cent of their salaries, as I understand the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How would you manage it to pay the salaries that you will have to pay for the next twenty-five years out of 3 per cent of their salaries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have answered that question once, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, by giving the figures for the first twelve years. At the end of twelve years, the computation shows, we will have a surplus of $62,325 to the credit of the fund.

Mr. MANN. Now, that I would like to have explained. It must be a new system of arithmetic.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the House will bear with me, I will read the statement again, though I have already read it.

Mr. BROMWELL. It seems to me that there is an error made on page 12, in paragraph 2, which probably occurred in attempting to amend the bill from its original form. As it is, it does not make very good sense.

> Employees who have been employed as above named for a period of twenty years.

Now, that is one condition, and then:

> And those who have been employed thirty years and who are disabled from the performance of their duties may be retired.

Now, ought not that to be just the reverse? "Employees who have been employed as above named for a period of thirty years" and "those who have been employed twenty years and who are disabled," etc.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; "those who are disabled" applies to both classes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Tell me, if you please, why there should be two periods of employees; those who have been employed "twenty" years and those who have been employed "thirty" years. Why not at once say this——

Mr. WADSWORTH. This says:

> Employees who have been employed as above named for a period of twenty years and those who have been employed thirty years and who are disabled from the performance of their duties may be retired, and when so retired shall be paid an annuity equal to 40 per cent and 50 per cent respectively.

There are two distinct classes.

Mr. BROMWELL. There are two classes, then, as to retirement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. One gets 40 per cent and the other gets 50 per cent.

Mr. GRIGGS. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GRIGGS. I notice you say: "That beginning on the 1st day of July."

Mr. WADSWORTH. What page?

Mr. GRIGGS. On page 11. "That beginning on the 1st day of July, 1900, there shall be withheld each month from the salaries of the employees of the Weather Bureau," and so forth, "3 per cent, or so much as the retirement board hereinafter described shall determine to be necessary for the purposes herein specified." Now, that is an involuntary contribution upon the part of those employees, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; in a way.

Mr. GRIGGS. This law requires that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This law would require that.

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, after having contributed to that fund for ten years, suppose that that employee is discharged?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he is discharged for cause, he loses any equity that he may have under this fund.

Mr. GRIGGS. Then you have reduced his salary by just so much.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he is discharged for cause; but mind the distinction we make——

Mr. GRIGGS. But prior to the discharge, during that ten years, you have reduced his salary in order that you may apply an amount to pay the insurance, or indemnity rather, to some other employee who may come in at the end of that time in his place.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; but in the meantime he has been insured; and if his conduct had been faithful, he would not have forfeited his rights and equities in the retirement fund; and you must also bear in mind that he goes into this service voluntarily. He can read this law before he goes in.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman understands so long as the party who is insured lives it is not worth much to him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is another paragraph, paragraph 5, on page 13, which provides:

> That any employee who has contributed as herein provided to the Weather Bureau retirement fund hereby authorized, who shall die before retirement, shall have paid to the person previously designated by him, but to no other person, etc.

Does that mean during ten years if the man be retired? What happens to him if he should pass ten years and still be in the service and then die?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He gets the benefit of the retirement fund.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Having read with considerable interest the statement that the gentleman from New York presented to the House, I find that it is estimated that at the end of twelve years after the law has gone into operation 43 will have been retired out of 654 employees.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is on account of age only.

Mr. MANN. Well, how soon will the rest of them be retired when there are only 43 retired out of 654 in twelve years? Is it safe to assume, as the chairman assumed, that few people will live long enough to be retired? But if there are to be as many as 300 in eight years, how is the 3 per cent going to furnish a sufficient amount to meet the charges against the fund?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is simply a conjecture; you can not figure it out exactly. In figuring insurance you can not figure absolutely accurately. There are always certain chances.

Mr. MANN. But no insurance company has ever figured such a small percentage as 43 out of 654 in twelve years. You estimate that three-fourths of the people will still be in the employ of the Government for twenty years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman must remember that under this bill no man is admitted to the service who is older than 35 years.

Mr. MANN. According to the bill as I read it, the maximum age for observers, clerks, and stenographers in making appointments is 30 years; for artisans, watchmen, and mechanics, 35 years; for messengers, 25 years. Of these classes probably 75 per cent would live long enough to take advantage of the retirement fund. As I understand, at the end of twenty years anybody can be retired——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the retiring board can retire them upon 40 per cent of their regular salary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not unless for disability. The question of retirement after thirty years of service rests entirely with the retiring board unless the employee has reached the age of 65. Then it is compulsory.

Mr. MANN. That is to say, upon application they are entitled to retirement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not unless in the judgment of the retiring board they are entitled to retirement on account of old age or disability.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides, as I understand, that after twenty years they shall receive 40 per cent, and after thirty years 60 per cent, of their regular salaries——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only those who are disabled for the performance of their duty. I call attention particularly to that point.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman recognizes, I presume, the fact that no man when dismissed from the service will admit that there was just ground for his dismissal. A further suggestion which occurs to me is this: As to the right to retirement, what expense will the Government be subjected to in determining the judicial questions connected therewith?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Those questions are disposed of by the retirement board, consisting of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, with two assistants from the Bureau named by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In other words, these employees of the Government devote to this business time that should be devoted to the regular service of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] for a question.

Mr. GAINES. In this report one of the purposes of the bill is thus stated:

> The granting of authority to the employees of the Bureau to create, exclusively from their own moneys, a fund for the retirement of disabled and aged officials, this to be accomplished without one dollar of expense to the Federal Government, and in such a way that at no time in the future can the Federal Government be called on to contribute in any manner to the fund.

Now, have not these employees the right, without any bill of this kind, to get up a mutual benefit association, making contributions out of their own salaries? If that is so, what is the object of this part of the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have already answered that question.

Mr. GAINES. I did not catch the gentleman's answer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think that such a system without authority of law would be practically effective. I do not believe that the more than 600 employees of this Bureau scattered over different parts of the country could effectively carry on such an organization without some authority of law.

Mr. GAINES. Is there any other provision in this bill with reference to pensions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. GAINES. Is there any other provision in this bill—anything along the same line—in the way of pensions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are five or six sections of the bill treating this subject under different aspects, and making provision for this retirement fund. I do not know that I yet get the meaning of the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman has already answered my first question. I am now asking, Is there any other provision in the bill of similar nature—pertaining to pensions for employees of this Bureau?

Mr. CANNON. Pensions by whom?

Mr. GAINES. Pensions by the employees—pensions referred to in the paragraph of the report stating the second object of the bill, which I read at first.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should be glad to have the gentleman state his question again.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman has answered my first question. I read from page 1, paragraph 2, of the report the committee's statement of the object of the bill:

> The granting of authority to the employees of the Bureau to create exclusively from their own moneys a fund for the retirement of disabled and aged officials, etc.

Which I read at first. Now, the gentleman has said that that plan is not feasible. If so, I presume he will strike the provision from the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Strike what from the bill?

Mr. GAINES. As the gentleman has said that such a provision would not be feasible, I presume he does not desire to retain it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I said that it would not be feasible to undertake to maintain a system of this kind by the mere voluntary action of the different employees of the Bureau without any authority of law.

Mr. GAINES. Are you then going to compel them to do this?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES. Compel a man to contribute out of his salary to this pension fund?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; he himself receives the benefit. It is, as I have said, a sort of insurance fund.

Mr. THROPP. Can not these employees, apart from any Government assistance, organize an association by means of which they can take care of themselves as efficiently as by the method here proposed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have already said that I do not believe such a system is practicable. By mere voluntary action it would be very hard to bring so numerous a body of employees into cooperation upon any line of action.

Mr. THROPP. In other words, this bill proposes to make them do what they would not do themselves?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir. There has not been a single protest from any one employee of the Bureau against this measure. On the contrary, I understand, upon the best authority, that the employees of the Bureau all desire the adoption of such a measure. I have received many letters from employees all over the United States urging the passage of the bill, and not one single protest from any employee of the Bureau against it.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. As I understand my friend, he figures that of these 634 employees 43 would retire in twelve years. Those are the figures which have been stated, as I understand it. Now, it would take, on that basis, one hundred and eighty years to retire the whole 634, would it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; not necessarily.

Mr. LACEY. You divide them up into sections of 43 for every twelve years, and then you multiply it by a sufficient number of twelve-year terms to dispose of all these men, and that takes one hundred and eighty years.

Mr. BABCOCK. Is that algebra or arithmetic? [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. That is arithmetic.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not a fair statement of the case. You can not tell how many would retire every year, and under the operation of the bill it is proposed to get in younger clerks all the time.

Mr. LACEY. Then the basis of 43 to every twelve years is too low. Then, as I understand, it would take 86 in twenty-four years, and then, multiplying it again, 172 in the next twenty-four years.

Mr. BABCOCK. Why does the gentleman multiply thus?

Mr. LACEY. Because he has divided it into sections of twelve years, which disposes of 43 men every twelve years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; we have not done that. We have only shown what we have estimated will be the workings of it for the first twelve years.

Mr. LACEY. That is where the trouble comes in with all these mutual insurance companies. They get along first rate for twelve years and then the trouble begins. Then the next twelve years instead of there being forty-three there would probably be very many more.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But you have the same number of employees all the time paying this 3 per cent.

Mr. LACEY. But this is a matter of arithmetic.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not absolutely a matter of arithmetic. You can not make it so.

Mr. LACEY. As soon as we get this thing started, what assurance have we that they will not come in here and ask us to raise their salaries this 3 per cent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If Congress has not the courage to resist that demand, then we must take the consequences and be responsible to our constituents for it.

Mr. GAINES. As I understand, the gentleman's bill compels all employees of the Weather Bureau to contribute to this fund out of which these pensions are ultimately to be paid?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but no man is compelled to be an employee of the Government. If a man goes into that Bureau, he does it voluntarily and with a full knowledge of the law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] standing by his seat has addressed the Chair several times. Does the gentleman from New York yield to him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to ask this question: Section 19 of this bill provides for a retiring board, and also that all retirements, both compulsory and voluntary, shall be made upon the report of said board, and so forth. Then there is a further provision that in no case shall a retirement be made unless the current revenues of the retirement fund be sufficient to bear the additional expense.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman this question: What will be the practical effect of that last provision? In other words, will it not continue on the pay rolls of the Government all employees of this Bureau whether they are rendered inefficient by age, disease, or other cause? In other words, will they not retain their places on the pay rolls of the Government until the fund arising from this source is sufficient to retire them? Is not that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We put that proviso in as an additional safeguard that the Government should not be responsible in any manner for the payment of this retirement fund.

Mr. FINLEY. But in view of the fact that these employees can not be retired, either voluntarily or compulsorily, under this bill, until the current revenues are sufficient to pension them, then will they not remain on the pay rolls of the Government whether they are able to render any service or not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that will be the practical effect of it until there are sufficient current revenues in the fund.

Mr. FINLEY. Does it not have the effect of pensioning in this way employees of the Government in this service who can no longer render service to the Government? Is not that the practical effect of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the face of it that would appear to be the case, but it does not in effect. It simply would keep them in employment until the retirement fund reached the necessary amount. Then they would be retired.

Mr. FINLEY. Is not this an innovation, and a very important one?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will say further to the gentleman that this can only be a temporary block, because the fund will quickly reach an amount sufficient to allow of their retirement.

Mr. FINLEY. But while this temporary condition lasts it will have the effect to pension this class of employees.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, no; not a bit of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to interrupt the gentleman merely for a moment to answer the suggestion made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY]. This does not mean, nor could it mean, that anybody would be deprived of his retirement and his right to share in this retirement fund. It simply means this—I will read the language:

> That in no case shall a retirement be made unless the current revenues of the retirement fund be sufficient to bear the additional expense.

Now, let us say there are seven men who are entitled to retirement, but the current revenues are sufficient only to bear the retirement in that year of five of those men. Then those five who are first entitled to their retirement take it, and the other two are merely delayed until the next year's current fund comes in, when they will be the first to be retired during that year, and in the meantime they pay nothing. They are still on the list of paid employees, and are not entitled to retirement for that current year, but are entitled to retirement as the first two men in the next current year, so that their retirement is merely delayed.

Now, that was put here for this purpose: We thought, perhaps, at some time in the future, notwithstanding the fact that this bill says that under no circumstances shall the Government have anything to do with this, except to fix the regulations under which the collections and payments shall be made and to take the money on deposit in the Treasury, that it might happen that some retirement might be made when there was not sufficient current revenue in the fund.

And then he would go to his Senator and all his Congressmen, and they would go to work and make appeals to Congress for the purpose of making a special fund for him. So that, in addition to the other, we put this clause in here so that he should not only not become a burden upon the Government, but that he should not become a burden upon that retirement fund unless the current fund was sufficient for his retirement.

Mr. GRIGGS. You contemplate retiring an employee when he reaches that age at which he is unfit for service?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir; and then he is compulsorily retired by this act.

Mr. GRIGGS. If the employee reaches that period of incapacity, and there is not money enough in the fund, you carry him at the full salary by the Government for another year?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Yes, you do; and the only difference is this: That as now constituted we would be carrying two men upon the Government list for one year, but should we go on under the law and work as it stands now, we are carrying them on until they die; because just the minute that you discharge a man from Georgia, a man from South Carolina, a man from Texas, or a Vermonter, you do not stop it, for both the Senators and nearly all the Representatives from that particular State will go hounding around the Executive Departments of the Government telling them they are relegating this poor, old, worn-out servant to obscurity and to poverty, and there will be no way of getting rid of the superannuated people or getting them retired until the act of God relieves the people of the United States of the burden of supporting them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. I would like to have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has not ten minutes at his disposal.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rose a moment ago to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like now to be recognized in my own right as a member of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. Would not the gentleman add five minutes to the time given me by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, both gentlemen are on the same side of the question, and there are those of us who are opposed to their ideas on this bill who would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. No arrangement has been made with reference to the division of the time.

Mr. GRIGGS. Those of us who are opposed to the bill would like to have a division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would first recognize, in accordance with the usual practice, members of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized in my own right, I will yield time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to move that the committee rise and let the House fix the time for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH (to Mr. GRIGGS). Would not that be satisfactory?

Mr. GRIGGS. That would be satisfactory to me. The committee seems to be unanimous about it.

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; the committee was not unanimous. I am a member of the committee and voted against it. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman says he yields to the gentleman from Mississippi. I wish to yield five minutes of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]; and after that I would agree with the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, that the committee rise and let the House fix the time for the debate. I would like to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio at the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand. The gentleman from New York yields the remainder of his time, which is now three minutes, to the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Mississippi yields five minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield all but a minute of my time.

Mr. BROWN. Will not the gentleman make it ten minutes altogether?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio that there is nobody yet in possession of any time, except the gentleman from New York, who has the floor and has two minutes remaining. The Chair would, however, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, and he might make such disposition of the time as he sees best.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I will yield sufficient time to make the total time of the gentleman from Ohio ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that inasmuch as the committee seems to be all on one side of this question, it would be a mistake to give each member of that committee his hour. As I understand the rule, as stated by the Chair, it is that after the committee has used an hour some gentleman in opposition to the measure would be recognized for an hour.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I propose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think there would be any trouble about it. I think we can agree about general debate. I think you can do so in the committee by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the committee was not unanimous.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for helping me in my effort to get ten minutes of the time of this committee.

I think, sir, that when the members of this committee give careful attention to the 16 pages of this bill, they will find that it contains a good many things which are of interest to every member of the House, not only with respect to this particular measure, but with respect to other legislation that will probably come before the House at the present session.

I have given a hasty examination to the bill since the House went into Committee of the Whole. I find that the gentlemen of the committee reporting this bill have carefully and perhaps wisely refrained from the use of the word "pension." They have prepared a sugar-coated pill, if I may use that term with respect to the work of these gentlemen, and they call this allowance an "annuity," appearing to desire to avoid the use of the word "pension." But I submit that whatever word be used here, it is in fact the granting of a pension for civil service.

Now, it is provided by this bill that an employee of this Bureau who has served for ten years and who is disabled for the performance of his duty may be retired and paid an "annuity" equal to 30 per cent of his average annual pay during the last five years previous to his retirement; that an employee of the Bureau who has served twenty years, if so disabled, may be retired and paid an "annuity" of 40 per cent of his average annual salary for five years, and 50 per cent if he has served thirty years. It further provides that an employee who has reached the age of 60 years and been employed for thirty years, without reference to whether he is unable to perform his duties, may be retired and paid 60 per cent of his average annual salary for five years past; and that an employee who has reached the age of 65 years and who has been employed thirty years shall be compulsorily retired and paid 75 per cent of the average annual pay received by him during the last five years previous to his retirement. These "annuities" are to be paid out of a fund to be raised by assessing all the employees of the Bureau 3 per cent of their salaries, the amount so collected to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and credited to what is called the "Weather Bureau retirement fund."

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to inquire into the calculations by which the committee seems to think it has arrived at a safe conclusion that the 3 per cent withheld from the salaries will produce the amount necessary to pay these annuities. I am not particular about that point now. What I desire to say is that I think we may as well face the question, we may as well now look squarely in the face of the fact, that this is a proposition which is to be the beginning of what we are in the habit of speaking of as a civil pension roll; and I think no member of this committee can vote to report this bill favorably to the House without having made up his mind that it is time for the Government to adopt this policy of granting civil pensions.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am utterly opposed to such a system. I am not more opposed to it in this bill than I would be elsewhere. I am opposed to it all along the line. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there is now in the Committee on Civil Service Reform in this House a bill introduced by the chairman of this committee in the last Congress, providing for a general system or plan of giving pensions, or "annuities," as the gentleman on the Agricultural Committee would say, to those who, at certain ages or certain stages in their career, are retired from office in the civil service of the Government. I do not wish at this time to enter into a general discussion on this pension proposition. I simply want to say to members of this House that I do not see how they can favor such a proposition as is presented in this case in reference to the employees of the Weather Bureau without having made up their minds that the plan is a good one for the general civil service of the Government.

I reserve to some future time, when I may be fortunate enough to obtain the floor, an expression of my opinion at length on that question, or at least at greater length than now. But there is one other feature of this bill to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. Aside from all the other features of this bill which are objectionable to me, there is here a proposition—I ask the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House and on this—to establish in this particular case a tenure of office for life, or substantially that, and this, Mr. Chairman, is another thing to which, speaking simply for myself, I am utterly opposed.

Gentlemen who will examine section 10 of this bill will find that when an employee has served for one year satisfactorily in this Bureau, he shall not after that be removed at any time except for causes mentioned in that section. In other words, if he shall have served one year satisfactorily—if his term of probation for one year shall be completed to the satisfaction of his superiors—then, Mr. Chairman, he shall hold his office in the service of this Weather Bureau for life unless he shall be retired under this sweet-coated "annuity" provision.

Now, is the House of Representatives or, more accurately speaking right now, is this Committee of the Whole prepared to report to the House that we have reached a piece of legislation which is wise and by which we are to establish the system of indefinite tenure in office and old-age pensions? Why is it not provided here that after a man shall have served one year satisfactorily he may not be removed, say, within four years, unless for some of the causes specified? I am perfectly ready, Mr. Chairman, to give to these employees a specified term of office—make it two years, three years, or four. I would be satisfied to give them four years; but at the end of four years I would make them subject to removal by their superiors, leaving it so that they might be reappointed or removed to make way for new men, as the appointing officer might deem best for the good of the public service.

In that respect, again, gentlemen of the committee, we are brought face to face with a proposition which is growing in all directions in this country, that we ought to establish a life tenure in office. I do not believe in it. I think the House does not believe in it, and it is because no particular attention has been called to this section that I here mention it as I do. I can not argue this now. There is not time to do it in ten minutes. I merely want, as far as I am able to do so, to have every member of this committee see, first, that it is here proposed to inaugurate a civil-pension system for employees in the civil service of the Government, and, secondly, that we are right here and now asked by this committee to put into this bill and establish as law the doctrine and theory of a life tenure in office. This is not right. It will still further strengthen and build up the present aristocracy of office holding. It is not in line with the principles on which our Government is supposed to be conducted. It will injure the public service and create a decrepit class of civil pensioners.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3988) to reorganize and improve the United States Weather Bureau, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3988, and pending that motion, I move that the general debate upon the bill be concluded at 5 o'clock this evening, the time to be equally divided between those opposed to the bill and those in favor of it.

Mr. LOUD. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he has already occupied one hour and forty minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think all sides have used a good deal of that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill just referred to, and pending that, he moves that general debate be closed at 5 o'clock this evening, and that the time until 5 o'clock be equally divided between those opposing and those favoring the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I suggest that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] be allowed to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LOUD. That will give the opponents of this bill only forty minutes in which to discuss one of the greatest measures that has ever come before the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state for the information of the House that the question of the division of time should be arranged in Committee of the Whole and should not be coupled with this motion.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will be a little more fair than to take an hour and forty minutes for his side of the question and allow the opponents only forty minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I occupied nearly my whole time in answering questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Fully half of the time was taken up in the answering of questions on both sides.

Mr. DINSMORE. I should like to ask if it is contemplated to come to a vote this afternoon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. LOUD. Let it go back into Committee of the Whole and let us talk it out, because the whole civil-service list is back of this.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the House requires more time to debate it, I am willing that there should be more time. I do not want to cut off anyone who wishes to debate the bill. I agree with the gentleman from California that this is a most important measure.

Mr. LOUD. Why not let the general debate go on?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We can not get the time.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to have a half hour myself.

Mr. GRIGGS. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I know of enough gentlemen right around me here to take up more than an hour in this debate in opposition to the measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I say I am perfectly willing to yield more time if you want it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will suggest to the gentleman that he make his motion to allow three hours for general debate, and that he control the time in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] control the time against it.

Mr. GRIGGS. Make it four hours, and I will not object to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make that motion, that the general debate be closed in four hours.

The SPEAKER. Without any reference to the division of time, which must be arranged in Committee of the Whole; because if it were otherwise, it would deprive the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole of the right of recognition which he should have and place it in the hands of the Speaker. That matter must go untrammeled into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If four hours are devoted to general debate under this motion, will the time be so divided that we shall adjourn at 5 o'clock and go on to-morrow afternoon?

The SPEAKER. It will be unfinished business when we are again in Committee of the Whole in the morning hour.

Mr. BROMWELL. Then we will adjourn at the usual time, 5 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. They may run on until morning.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How will the time be divided between the two sides?

The SPEAKER. That must be determined in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We will give half to each side.

The SPEAKER. The House must not tie up the Committee of the Whole on that question. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 3988, and pending that, he moves that general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to four hours.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUD. Suppose this measure should not be disposed of to-day. When would it be the order of business again?

The SPEAKER. When we are again in the Committee of the Whole in the morning hour.

Mr. LOUD. It may be to-morrow, and it may be a month hence.

The SPEAKER. It may be to-morrow, and it may be some days hence.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] will see the position in which he puts the House by debating the bill for an hour and forty minutes himself and then proposing a month from now to allow only half the time to the other side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LOUD) there were—ayes 78, noes 49.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were refused, 3 members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand therefor.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the motion to limit debate prevails. The question now recurs on the motion to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that he was in doubt; and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 64.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. LOUD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 73.

So the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was lost.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, that motion was to go into Committee of the Whole, or was it to limit debate?

The SPEAKER. That was the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does this bill continue as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will when the House is in Committee of the Whole and the House is pursuing the particular order that it has been this morning.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHACKLEFORD, for five days, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a detailed statement of expenditures of appropriations for contingent expenses of the Navy Department—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication relating to additional items in the appropriation for the Military Academy—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Quartermaster-General of the Army recommending an increase of the number of post quartermaster sergeants—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. ALLEN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal stands approved, without objection.

BRUNSWICK, GA., HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 22d instant, a letter from Mr. Henry L. Marindin, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, stating that his report on the survey of the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., showing the amount of work done on that bar since the last report, its cost and its value to the Government, would be forwarded without unnecessary delay; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1899; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 3) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1040) to amend section 445 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the licensing of officers of steam vessels; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BATE. I present a resolution of the legislature of Tennessee, in favor of the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. As it is the action of the legislative body, I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint resolution No. 102. Concurrent resolution of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Tennessee to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, asking for the election of a United States Senator by a direct vote of the people.

Whereas experience has demonstrated that the interests of the people would be best served by the election of United States Senators by the vote of the people of the various States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Tennessee (the senate concurring), That our representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use all honorable means to secure the submission of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people.

Resolved further, That copies of this resolution, properly attested, be sent to our representatives in Congress of the United States.

Adopted April 5, 1899.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SEID WADDELL,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved April 7, 1899.

BENTON McMILLIN, Governor

Mr. McLAURIN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C., and a memorial of the Merchants' Exchange of Charleston, S. INTRODUCTION OF DOMESTIC REINDEER INTO ALASKA.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject was referred, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska for 1899," of which 250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 750 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate may be reconsidered in adopting the resolution providing for the printing of the report upon the introduction of domestic reindeer into Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to a reconsideration? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT of New York. As chairman of the Committee on Printing I move to amend the resolution by increasing the number to 2,000 additional copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to amend the resolution reported by the committee. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out "one," in line 2 of the resolution, before the word "thousand," and insert "two;" so as to read:

That there be printed 2,000 copies, additional, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 5 of the resolution, strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" and in line 6 strike out "seven hundred and fifty" and insert "fifteen hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska for 1899," of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

PRESENTATION OF CANNON TO NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. PERKINS. On behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back from that committee, without amendment, the bill (S. 2431) to present to the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, the cannon on the gunboat Nashville from which was fired the first shot of the Spanish-American war, and to make a verbal report favorable to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BATE. I wish to ask for the present consideration of the bill. There is no objection to it in the least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to condemn and detach from the gunboat Nashville the cannon from which was fired the first shot in the Spanish-American war, and to deliver the same to the said city of Nashville, to be placed in some public place in that city, the title to the said cannon to be vested in the said city: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States through delivery of said cannon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BATE. I ask that the very short series of resolutions adopted by the city council of Nashville be entered in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be entered in the RECORD.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolution regarding the "initial gun."

Whereas in the recent Spanish-American war a new glory was added to American arms, and in the fortune of war it so happened that the initial shot was fired from the gunboat Nashville, then commanded by a son of our own State, a State which has borne its part in every conflict which has engaged American valor; and

Whereas this gunboat was not only commanded by one of our own sons and bore the name of the capital of this Commonwealth, but also bore the name of a distinguished soldier of the Revolution whose blood was shed for American liberty; and

Whereas it is the desire of the people of Nashville, expressed through the chamber of commerce, the park commission, the mayor and city council, the press, and the public generally, to possess the very gun which opened a war which will be illustrious in the history of nations, not only for the reason of its successful and brilliant termination, but also for the fact that it was inaugurated in a spirit of humanity and chivalry to relieve an oppressed people from starvation, tyranny, and despotism: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the mayor and city council of Nashville, That the members of Congress from the State of Tennessee are respectfully and earnestly requested to use their best offices and most strenuous efforts to induce the Congress of the United States to condemn the gun that fired the first shot from the gunboat Nashville and to intrust it to the keeping of our people; and we hereby authorize our Representatives in Congress to assure the Congress of the United States that if this request be granted we will receive and hold this gun as a dear and sacred trust; we will place it in a prominent position within the limits of our city, zealously keep and care for it, that it may as a monument of past valor and heroism, in the years to come, inspire our people with a higher idea of liberty and incite them to patriotic deeds in war and in peace. And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be engrossed and signed by the mayor and the members of the city council and the board of public works and be transmitted to the Senate of the United States through our Senator, WILLIAM B. BATE.

Resolution introduced by Alfred E. Howell.

The foregoing resolution was unanimously adopted by the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tenn., on June 22, 1899.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHEYENNE, WYO.

Mr. WARREN. My attention has just been called to the Calendar. Some time since I reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill (S. 1893) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to complete the public building at Cheyenne, Wyo. I find that the Calendar shows it to have been reported from the Committee on Claims. I desire now to present a report upon that bill. The report comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I ask that the Calendar be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be corrected, and the report will be received and printed under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 2748) to provide for a voluntary retirement fund in the several Executive Departments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BAKER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2749) granting a pension to Washington Butler;

A bill (S. 2750) granting a pension to Isaac Gifford;

A bill (S. 2751) granting a pension to Enos F. Henderson;

A bill (S. 2752) granting a pension to Abigail M. Wheeler;

A bill (S. 2753) granting an increase of pension to David H. Morey (with an accompanying photograph);

A bill (S. 2754) granting a pension to E. E. Harvey;

A bill (S. 2755) granting a pension to Isaac N. Cissna;

A bill (S. 2756) granting an increase of pension to Henry Prosser;

A bill (S. 2757) for the relief of Robert White; and

A bill (S. 2758) granting an increase of pension to John M. Graham (with accompanying papers).

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2759) for the relief of Charles A. Bess; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2760) for the relief of Jerome Kunkel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 2761) for the relief of Philip Epstein, Mordecai David, Henry Stein, Julius Louis, and Herman Somers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 2762) to authorize the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Wynn W. Pefley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 2763) to amend the act of Congress approved February 11, 1897, authorizing the entry and patenting of lands containing petroleum and other mineral oils under the placer mining laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KENNEY introduced a bill (S. 2764) granting an increase of pension to William Murphy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2765) for the relief of Joseph Edward Montgomery and the heirs of Thomas Paul Leathers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 2766) granting a pension to James M. Kercheval; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 2767) granting a pension to Nellie L. Parsons; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT of New York introduced a bill (S. 2768) granting an increase of pension to George Howard Hitchcock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2769) for the relief of Warren Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 2770) granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Chill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2771) to amend sections 460, 463, and 468 of chapter 44, Title II, of an act entitled "An act to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska, and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district," approved March 3, 1899; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2772) to prevent, within stated times, the hunting, trapping, injury, or killing of certain game animals in the Territory of Alaska, and to prohibit the killing of the same at any time for their skins, hides, or horns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2773) to amend sections 179, 180, 181, 182, and 183 of chapter 12, Title I, of an act entitled "An act to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska, and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district," approved March 3, 1899; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut introduced a bill (S. 2774) granting an increase of pension to John H. Wilcox; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2775) for the relief of the estate of Richard L. Brown, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2776) granting an increase of pension to Pinnie L. Carr; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2777) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Trapp;
A bill (S. 2778) granting a pension to George Evans;
A bill (S. 2779) granting a pension to Robert Lenox;
A bill (S. 2780) granting a pension to Waity West;
A bill (S. 2781) granting a pension to William H. Moody;
A bill (S. 2782) granting a pension to Hattie Blanche Sears;
A bill (S. 2783) granting a pension to Mary A. Ellas;
A bill (S. 2784) granting an increase of pension to D. Cyrus Holdridge;
A bill (S. 2785) granting a pension to William H. Gardner;
A bill (S. 2786) granting an increase of pension to Aaron Stoughton; and A bill (S. 2787) granting an increase of pension to E. L. Poston.

Mr. THURSTON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 2788) for the relief of Wells C. McCool;
A bill (S. 2789) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Furman D. Lee; and
A bill (S. 2790) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Frederick Mause.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 2791) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the Bacheller Pneumatic Tube Company to construct a pneumatic tube between the Government Printing Office and the Capitol, in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANNA introduced a bill (S. 2792) to correct the military record of Augustus Crowell; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2793) to correct the military record of James Kelly; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HANNA introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2794) granting an increase of pension to Rachel Wells;
A bill (S. 2795) granting an increase of pension to Christina Noll;
A bill (S. 2796) granting a pension to Jane Sheppard; and
A bill (S. 2797) granting a pension to Jonathan Budd.

Mr. HANNA introduced a bill (S. 2798) for the relief of William T. Alexander; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WARREN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 80) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,311 to pay the claims for improvements made upon lands within the Wind River Indian Reservation in the State of Wyoming, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1040) to amend section 445 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the licensing of officers of steam vessels, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2100) granting a pension to Annie E. Brumby.

Mr. COCKRELL. I gave notice yesterday that I should object to any bill being taken up on the Calendar unless reached in its regular order. If we go to the Calendar, we can reach and dispose of all the unobjected bills in a very short time.

Mr. HALE. Why does not the Senator from Missouri now propose that at the end of the routine morning business we shall go to the Calendar and take it up for the consideration of unobjected cases, and have that settled now?

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. HALE. I was suggesting that the Senator might now propose, in the line he has just indicated, that at the end of the routine morning business we shall go to the Calendar and take it up, considering only unobjected cases under Rule VIII. That would give everybody a chance on the Calendar. That course can be pursued this morning unless some Senator has given notice that he wants to take the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] gave notice some time since that he would take the floor immediately after the conclusion of the routine business this morning.

Mr. HALE. Of course nobody would want to interfere with a speech to be made in pursuance of notice previously given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia informed the Chair that he does not desire to take the floor before half past 1 to-day.

Mr. HALE. Then I hope the Senator from Missouri will make that proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that the Senator from Florida desires to call up a pension bill for a very old lady. I have in charge two or three cases of exactly the same kind. We considered yesterday evening pension bills, and I am perfectly willing that the continuation of the consideration of unobjected pension bills shall be concluded the first thing when the Calendar is reached.

Mr. HALE. After the routine morning business.

Mr. COCKRELL. After the routine morning business. It will not take over fifteen or twenty minutes to dispose of the unobjected pension cases, and then there will be no necessity for Senators to appeal to the courtesy of the Senate to call them up and have them considered out of their regular order.

Mr. HOAR. What is the present order, Mr. President?

Mr. BERRY. It was stated by the Chair that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has given notice that he will not desire to speak until half past 1 o'clock. I wish at some time during the day to make a few remarks, not lengthy, very short, on the financial bill. I had supposed that that bill would come up at 2 o'clock this afternoon, and I would then have the opportunity to make the remarks which I desire to make some time during the day. If the Senator from Georgia does not begin until half past 1 o'clock, the probabilities are that there will be no time to say anything on the financial bill to-day. However, I do not wish to interfere with his convenience in the premises, and I simply state that at some time after 2 o'clock to-day I wish to make a few remarks on the financial bill.

Mr. CLAY. My colleague [Mr. BACON] has just notified me that he can not reach here until half after 1 o'clock, and that at that time or shortly thereafter he will desire to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

SPACE IN CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to consider and report some suitable plan for an enlargement of the Capitol and for providing for the transaction of public business other than legislative business elsewhere, so that there may be sufficient space provided for the convenient transaction of the business of the two Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut rose.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not going to make a formal objection to the consideration of the resolution this morning. I merely wish to suggest that it seems to commit the Senate to the project of enlarging the Capitol, as I heard it read, and that appears to be a rather large subject to be committed to, without any debate or consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I will remove that objection. I merely intended to have the committee take jurisdiction of the subject. I will amend the resolution by directing the committee "to consider and report whether a suitable plan may be adopted."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That will be satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his resolution as follows.

Mr. HOAR. "Whether a suitable plan may be adopted."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is all right.

Mr. HOAR. I had no desire of committing the Senate to anything, and I do not understand that the resolution as I originally offered it does that; but I will remove the Senator's doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to consider and report whether a suitable plan may be adopted for an enlargement of the Capitol and for providing for the transaction of public business other than legislative business elsewhere, so that there may be sufficient space provided for the convenient transaction of the business of the two Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to inquire whether that is not a resolution which should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. HOAR. That particular subject, a provision for the convenience of the Senate and the House for legislative business, always has gone, as I understand it, in the past to the Committee on Rules. Of course if that committee should report that it was desirable to have an enlargement of the Capitol or desirable to have at once a hall of justice or to remove the library still in the Capitol, the subject would then go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or the latter question to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the resolution falls within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules, I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Our committee is now dealing with the subject of committee rooms by order of the Senate, and it is impossible to do the duty which is already assigned to it without considering whether the business of the public other than legislative is at some time or other to be banished from the Capitol.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I agree with the Senator that there is great necessity for additional accommodations.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say, though perhaps it is not necessary for the matter of this resolution, that I think this whole building will be required for legislative purposes, and some additions can probably be made between Pennsylvania avenue, where the Navy and Army statue is, and the basement of the Capitol. All the space will be needed for the two Houses of Congress, and the sooner provision is made elsewhere for the Supreme Court of the United States the better it will be for the public service. But I suppose that question, before any practical action is taken, would go to another committee than the Committee on Rules. However, I want the Committee on Rules, who are now dealing with the question between the two Houses, I understand, of the disposition of the space left vacant in the old library, to have before them the extent of the necessities of this and the other House for legislative business, so that they will have the right to inform us how much more space we need than is at present within our control.

Mr. VEST. I could not catch all that the Senator from Massachusetts said, but I infer from the little I did hear that he stated the precedent in the Senate to be that resolutions of this sort should go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, perhaps before he proceeds he will allow me to restate what I said on that point. I said that it is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules to dispose of such space as is at the command of the Senate for the legislative purposes of the Senate; that if new buildings are to be constructed, that is to be done under the direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and that if any change is to be made in the library now in the Capitol, that is to be done on a report from the Committee on the Library.

Now, the Committee on Rules are considering the question of the disposition, for committee rooms or other legislative objects, of some space now vacant in the Capitol by reason of the departure of the library. That they have been directed by the Senate to do; and the object of the resolution is simply to have the committee also inform themselves how much more space is needed for our legislative purposes than we now have. That is the whole of it.

Mr. VEST. I was about to say, Mr. President, that while it is not a question of vital importance as to what committee takes charge of this matter, I have known but one instance in which the Committee on Rules was given jurisdiction of a subject like this, and that was done by inadvertence. It was when the sanitary condition of the Senate Chamber was considered. That question was first sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and we spent some $140,000 in improving the sanitary condition of this Chamber and of the committee rooms of the Senate. Subsequently, without anyone on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds giving any attention to the matter, the Committee on Rules took charge of the same subject and a large amount of money was spent under the supervision of that committee for the same purpose that had been considered before by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

It seems to me that this question ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If it be a question of space the whole subject ought to be considered. If additions are to be made to the Capitol, as a matter of course the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which is a joint committee of the two Houses, ought to consider that question.

During the last session of Congress, at the instance of our late lamented colleague, Senator Morrill, of Vermont, the Senate passed a bill to purchase ground immediately across the eastern space for the purpose of erecting a building for the Supreme Court of the United States; and if the question of space for the Supreme Court or the division of the space that has come from removing the library is to be considered, it ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If, however, the chairman of the committee, who sits on the other side of the Chamber, is willing to let it go to the Committee on Rules, as a matter of course I have no serious opposition to make; but it seems to me that the proper committee is not the Committee on Rules, which simply has cognizance, according to its name, of the rules that govern that portion of the Capitol which is assigned to the Senate. That ought not to be the committee to take this matter up; but the whole question can be considered by the joint committee of the two Houses on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am not familiar, Mr. President, with the course of practice which has been followed in such matters in the past. In what I said a moment ago I did not wish to be understood as surrendering the jurisdiction of this question to the Committee on Rules unless according to the practice of the past it should go to that committee rather than to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was my impression that the latter committee has jurisdiction of this subject.

My honorable friend the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has had long service upon the committee, and I would prefer rather to defer to his judgment upon the subject. It seems to me that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is peculiarly charged with the control of the subject, though I may be in error. The question has not hitherto arisen since my service upon the committee. The committee has no desire whatever to enlarge its jurisdiction, nor does it wish to avoid its duty in anywise.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to read the rules that are in force for the regulation of the Senate wing of the Capitol:

RULE I.

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, under the direction of the Presiding Officer, shall be the executive officer of the body for the enforcement of all rules made by the Committee on Rules for the regulation of the Senate wing of the Capitol and Senate annex.

This has been the rule from 1886 or thereabouts. Then there is another rule:

RULE XVI.

All provisions of the foregoing rules, so far as practicable, are made applicable to the building called the Senate annex, the buildings used for the storage of Senate documents, and the Senate stables.

Now, the Senate at this session—and it also did at the last session—has committed to the Committee on Rules a proposition for the disposition of the part of the Capitol left vacant by the Congressional Library when it was moved into its new quarters, and they are dealing with that subject. It is my impression that there has been a conference ordered between the two Houses on a difference of opinion upon a joint resolution on that subject.

Now, all I desire by this resolve is simply that that committee, when they report finally upon the disposition of this portion of the building, may report to the Senate what additional space is required for the execution of their duty to provide suitable accommodations for our committees and other legislative work. That subject has, I understand, always been before that committee, and it is now.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; with his permission, I will correct the Senator. At the last session of Congress that subject was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOAR. It was also before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That may be so; but there was a joint committee of the two Houses, of which the late Senator Morrill was chairman, and the subject was certainly before that committee for several months.

Mr. HOAR. But the matter of disposing of this space was also before the Committee on Rules.

I am a member of the Committee on Rules, and I have been for a great many years. I do not desire, and no member of that committee, I am sure, desires, to enlarge its jurisdiction on this subject by way of trenching on that of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The duty is very laborious, and it would be very unwelcome. Nobody would think of taking it away from the committee so well presided over by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS]. But the resolution was offered for the sake of calling the attention of the Senate pretty sharply to this need.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question as to which of the committees has jurisdiction over this subject is not a matter of very great importance, I assume. I remember very well a discussion which took place in this Chamber on the subject in the last Congress. It led me, as the then chairman of the Committee on Rules, to investigate what the precedents had been in regard to it. I found that prior to the present revision of the rules the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds did have jurisdiction over all the space in the Senate wing of the Capitol, but at the time of that revision, upon the recommendation of the present Presiding Officer of this body, a change was made, and all that part of the Senate wing that was in the jurisdiction of the Senate was committed to the Committee on Rules.

The question arose as to what disposition should be made of the old library space, which was by law under the jurisdiction of both branches of Congress. That question was considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and perhaps properly. Certainly the Committee on Rules have no desire or disposition to infringe upon that committee in any of its work. By general consent there was an informal conference between the members of the two committees as to what disposition should be made of that space. Afterwards the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds consented to have the resolution which had been reported by the Committee on Rules adopted. It was adopted and went to the other House, and no action was taken upon it. The chairman of the Committee on Rules in the present Congress offered a similar resolution, which went to the House, and that resolution is now, I think, in conference, or in the possession of the Committee on Rules. It is not a matter of any great consequence, but the facts are, I think, as I have stated them.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Rules I desire to say simply a word. These questions of jurisdiction between committees are always more or less disagreeable. Ever since I have been a member of the Senate, as I recollect it, the Committee on Rules has had jurisdiction over assignments of space in the Senate wing of the Capitol. It is an extremely delicate and annoying duty. I have found it a very great burden. I should be very glad, and I think the committee would cooperate with me, to have all that turned over to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds if they conceive it to be a part of their jurisdiction.

Anyway, Mr. President, we have exercised that jurisdiction. We have been obliged to ascertain every available foot of space in this end of the Capitol for the use of the Senate, and we know, perhaps better and more critically than the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, precisely what the situation is in the Senate wing of the Capitol. All, as I understand it, that the Senator from Massachusetts desires to accomplish by this resolution is a report to the Senate of the exact situation so far as this end of the Capitol is concerned.

Mr. HOAR. And the exact needs. That is the main thing.

Mr. SPOONER. The situation as to the necessities of the legislative service and the means now for meeting the requirements. The present situation is absolutely intolerable.

The Maltby Building never, I think, ought to have been purchased for the purpose for which it is used. It is impossible for Senators to discharge with any sort of comfort or convenience all of the duties of a Senator and occupy rooms in the Maltby Building. I tried it. Senators oftentimes during the session of the Senate, when not interested in some subject which is being discussed, work in their committee rooms and attend to correspondence, prepare reports, and do the immense work which devolves upon a Senator which is discharged outside of the Chamber. No man in the Maltby Building can reach the Senate Chamber, unless he runs half the way, in time to respond to his name when the roll is called. There are some Senators who are occupying rooms in the Maltby Building which are not fit for occupancy. There are Senators occupying rooms in this building, down in the crypt, which I think are absolutely injurious to health and which no Senator ought to be compelled to occupy. There is an absolute necessity for some change in the situation.

I care nothing about what committee makes report on the subject; but in view of what has been the course here in the last few years I think the Committee on Rules is perhaps better adapted at this moment to afford accurate and adequate information to the Senate as to the necessities of the situation than the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If the Senate should pass a resolution looking to an enlargement of the Capitol, I should admit, of course, that that subject should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There is really no question of jurisdiction here between the two committees.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I understand the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts to be simply a preliminary inquiry. It is manifest to Senators that at some time in the near future there must be a marked change in the disposition of the business of the two Houses. There seems to have been an objection to the enlargement of the Capitol, on account of increasing the weight, by the addition of another story or two stories, which would also result in the change of the architectural appearance of the building.

There are many people who believe that the present quarters of the Supreme Court are inadequate, and that their present situation interferes very largely with the convenience of members of the Senate in the Capitol, that court being located on the Senate side. I think it would be a wise thing to have a preliminary inquiry respecting this question; but when that inquiry is made and the facts are fully laid before the Senate, the result will be a largely increased expenditure, either for an independent building for the Supreme Court, which I think is desirable, or a large expenditure in this Capitol. When that comes, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should deal with it.

Mr. HOAR. Of course.

Mr. ALLISON. Because it will involve a large expenditure of money and great detail respecting the extent of the expenditure and the places where it shall be made.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a public-building matter.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a public-building matter. So I think that the inquiry suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is a proper one to be submitted now, either to the Committee on Rules or to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for what may be understood as a preliminary report preparatory to making such expenditure outside or such an enlargement of the Capitol as may be needed, leaving the Supreme Court within the Capitol building.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to speak further at any length on this question. What I desire to accomplish by the resolution is to have the Committee on Rules state to the Senate how much additional space is needed for the service of the Senate, which, under the rules, is under their direction. When they have said, "We want so much space, and it is practicable to get it," then I think the subject should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

But it does seem to me that the Senate is long-suffering and patient in this matter beyond all reason. I have no cause to complain. I have a most delightful committee room, and so has the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who has spoken so strongly of what is needed by the Senate. I have been here a great many years, but there are Senators who are perhaps more entitled to such conveniences than I am. Here is the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]—I happen to see the two gentlemen speaking together just now—who have rooms in the Maltby Building. They represent between them 11,000,000 people; that is, they represent each one-half of the power in the Senate of 11,000,000 people at least. They are condemned to those rooms in the Maltby Building, at a distance from the Capitol, where they can not get a document, where they can not see a constituent, and, if they are summoned to the Senate Chamber, can not be here in time for a roll call or a vote without perhaps traveling here on a stormy and inclement day, and my aged friend the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] having the tempests of heaven coming down on his beautiful and devoted head.

The terrace of the Capitol is worse. The terrace is ill-ventilated, damp, dark, and there, I suppose, are thirty or forty Senators going around and exclaiming day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year, with the Roman poet, "Quae regio in terris nostri non plena laboris."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I wish to add simply a word. I concur most heartily in what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as to the very great necessity of additional accommodations for the convenience of Senators in the transaction of the business of the Senate. The matter has been too long delayed.

I have, since this discussion began, read the resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, and it seems to me that it may very properly go to the Committee on Rules, and I have no objection to it being referred to that committee. The committee is simply to report upon a plan, a scheme, for the accommodation of the business of the Senate. After that is done, as the Senator has said, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may, under certain circumstances, properly take jurisdiction of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill (S. 727) to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary, accompanied by a memorial of Mr. David Lubin, being an argument in support of the amendment, which I ask may be printed with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator wish made of the amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which I think has the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. I also ask that the memorial which I have presented be printed immediately following the amendment, as it is an argument in support of the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Relations with Cuba is hereby authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time to report hearings and proceedings before the committee, and that the expense of the same, together with that of hearings already had, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That on Thursday, February 22, 1900, immediately after the reading of the Journal, Washington's Farewell Address be read to the Senate by Mr. FORAKER, a Senator from the State of Ohio, and that thereafter the Senate will proceed with its business.

TREATY RELATIVE TO SAMOAN ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether the people of Samoa were consulted or their wishes ascertained in relation to the treaty recently made between the United States and Germany in relation to said islands. The President is also requested to inform the Senate whether any protest has been received by him or the Department of State from the people of Samoa, or any of them, against said treaty.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, this is simply a resolution of inquiry with regard to important facts, it seems to me, in relation to the treaty with Germany for the division of Samoa between this country and the Empire of Germany. A treaty has been made by which we have agreed, so far as I can ascertain, without consulting the people of Samoa, to take a portion of that country and consent that Germany shall take the rest of it, without consulting the people of that country upon the subject. That is a country with which we have had treaty relations, and, as I understand, we had guaranteed their sovereignty, joining with Germany and Great Britain in a treaty to that effect. Now, without consulting those people, without their being a party to the agreement, we take a portion of the islands and Germany takes the rest of them. We blot out, then, a sovereign nation, a people with whom we have treaty relations, and divide the spoils.

I can remember well the indignation that swept over this country when Poland was partitioned between the three great powers of Europe. It seems to me the moral turpitude of thus dividing a country is no less because its inhabitants are not supposed by us to occupy as high a place in the plane of civilization as we occupy, and that those people have a right to be consulted and their consent secured before we can be a party in any way to their partition or their subjection.

I have tried to ascertain the facts which I ask for in the resolution by inquiring of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but it appears that nothing is before that committee, and there is no information on the subject. I therefore think the resolution ought to be passed and not referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because it is a fair inquiry with regard to facts which the people of this country ought to be in possession of, and because I fear that the resolution will remain in the Committee on Foreign Relations, as has the resolution expressing sympathy for the South African Republic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" have it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the senior Senator from Georgia has not voted.

Mr. WETMORE. Then I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator. Otherwise I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McMILLAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator has not voted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I inquire if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Idaho has not voted.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho, and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—39.

HISTORY OF FILIPINO REVOLT.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, at this time I wish to ask unanimous consent for the publication of the paper which I hold in my hand, and I shall be glad to briefly explain what it is before consent is asked.

It is a very interesting paper and is a statement by Aguinaldo of the controversy, giving a history of the revolt of the Filipinos against Spanish power from 1896 up to the 23d of last September. It is written in excellent temper and tone, is a very able document, and one, therefore, which must be of great interest not only to the Senate, but to the people of the United States, no matter what side they may take in this controversy.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the paper be printed as a document for the information of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then, I move that the paper——

Mr. CHANDLER. I raise the question that a motion is not in order at this time to print a document.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer a resolution then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution will be in order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer a resolution that the paper which I submit be printed as a document.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution be read before it is acted upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota will reduce his resolution to writing. [A pause.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the paper entitled an Authentic Review of the Philippine Revolution be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let that go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the resolution should go to the Committee on Printing under the twenty-ninth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] objects.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the resolution goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHANDLER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over anyway. It can not be acted on at all if objected to. There can be nothing done with the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. HOAR. Let the rule be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope it will not frighten the Senator from Massachusetts that there are three Senators on the floor objecting to the resolution. I am afraid he will think that abolishes the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, the rule to which he has referred will be read.

The Secretary read from Rule XXIX as follows:

1. Every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, or to print memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except bills of the Senate or House of Representatives, resolutions submitted by a Senator, communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing or select committees of the Senate, shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing. When a motion is made to commit with instructions, it shall be in order to add thereto a motion to print.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I submit, the resolution being objected to, nothing is in order except for it to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there is no conflict between the two rules. The Chair thinks the resolution goes over under the rule, and, unless otherwise ordered, to-morrow it will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

STATUE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the committee appointed under a concurrent resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling of the statue of Daniel Webster I submit a report which closes as follows:

The committee submits herewith a full report of the addresses delivered.

I ask that the report, with the accompanying documents, may be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for immediate use as a public document 11,000 copies of the proceedings in connection with the reception of the Webster statue on January 18, 1900, as reported by the committee of arrangements, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of Mr. Stilson Hutchins, 4,000 for the use of the Senate, and 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; also, 10,000 copies in the form prescribed by law for printing eulogies, of which in cloth binding 1,000 shall be for the use of Mr. Hutchins, 3,000 delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the States of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the resolution goes to the Committee on Printing under the standing rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHANDLER. In the meantime let the report and accompanying documents be printed in the ordinary form for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. And then referred to the Committee on Printing with the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CAFFERY. I desire to give notice that on next Monday morning, immediately after the morning business, I will address the Senate on the Philippine resolution.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the suggestion I made a while ago, that we devote a few minutes to the consideration of unobjected pension cases, in order to complete them. A number of Senators want them acted upon especially, and we can soon dispose of them. There are only a few.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that request?

Mr. COCKRELL. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How many minutes would the Senator suggest?

Mr. COCKRELL. Fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri requests that fifteen minutes be devoted to the consideration of unobjected pension cases on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The first pension bill on the Calendar will be stated.

LOUISA HALE.

The bill (S. 1295) granting a pension to Louisa Hale, announced as the first case in order on the Calendar, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. Campbell."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fifteen minutes have expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that was the last pension case on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the time has expired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. The time and case suited exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time expired at the right moment.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CUMBERLAND, MD.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1375) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Cumberland, Md.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the limit of cost for construction of the public building at Cumberland, Md., $50,000; and the limit of cost of the building and site is increased from $75,000 to $125,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. B. TELLEFSEN.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the first bill on the Calendar, the order of business being No. 11.

Mr. COCKRELL. Call for the Calendar. That will bring it up.

Mr. LODGE. It is the first bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order now without asking unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. It is in order without asking unanimous consent.

The bill (S. 1481) appropriating money to reimburse Capt. B. Tellefsen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $998.96 to Capt. B. Tellefsen, master of the Norwegian steamer Albert, for expenses incurred by him in consequence of a violation of Article XIII of the treaty of commerce and navigation of the year 1827 between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Sweden and Norway by an officer of the city of Boston, Mass., on the 18th day of July, 1892.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the bill been before Congress heretofore?

Mr. LODGE. A similar bill has passed the Senate twice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I recollect it.

Mr. LODGE. It has never got through the House. It is a claim that we ought to have paid long ago.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HATTIE A. PHILLIPS.

The bill (S. 197) for the relief of Hattie A. Phillips was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Hattie A. Phillips, widow of John Phillips, deceased, $5,000 as full compensation for the services rendered by him in bearing dispatches from the commanding officer at Fort Phil Kearny to Fort Laramie from December 21 to December 26, 1866.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know whether or not the payment is to be made out of the funds belonging to those Indians? I did not hear the whole bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reads "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then I do not object to it. I should like to hear it read again, though.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will again be read.

The Secretary again read the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 198) to reimburse the State of Wyoming for money expended by the Territory of Wyoming in protecting and preserving the Yellowstone National Park during the years 1885 and 1886 was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and was read by the Secretary.

Mr. VEST. From what committee does that bill come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Claims, the Chair is informed.

Mr. VEST. Is there any report from the Interior Department on it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. VEST. Does that report come from the committee or from the Interior Department? Has the bill ever been referred to the Interior Department? Let it go over until I can look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without losing its place on the Calendar?

Mr. VEST. Yes; I do not care about its place. I want to know something about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over on objection, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHEYENNE, WYO.

The bill (S. 1893) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to complete the public building at Cheyenne, Wyo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the cost of the public building and site at Cheyenne, Wyo., authorized by the act of June 30, 1897, to $325,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. E. MARR AND E. H. PIERCE.

The bill (S. 1740) to authorize C. E. Marr and E. H. Pierce to accept silver watches awarded to them by the government of the Dominion of Canada in recognition of their services in rescuing British sailors was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes C. E. Marr and E. H. Pierce, keepers of the Cuckolds, Maine, fog-signal station, to accept each a silver watch awarded to them, respectively, by the government of the Dominion of Canada in recognition of their services in rescuing the captain and crew of the schooner Aurora, of Harboursville, Nova Scotia, on January 4, 1896.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS IN MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is one pension bill on the Calendar that I think ought to have been considered this morning. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] introduced it. It pensions three soldiers who ought to have been pensioned long ago. I ask that the bill be read. It is Senate bill 2314.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2314) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," approved January 29, 1887.

It provides that the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," approved January 29, 1887, shall be so construed as to include the surviving paymasters' clerks in the Army as of the same relative rank and grade as pursers' clerks in the Navy, and that the surviving paymasters' clerks of the Army and the widows of those who have died shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits given by the act of January 29, 1887, to pursers' clerks of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, the credentials of Hon. William V. Sullivan, Senator-elect from Mississippi, were presented and read at the desk the other day. The Senator-elect is present, and I ask that he be sworn in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MASON in the chair). The Senator-elect will advance to the chair and the oath will be administered to him.

Mr. Sullivan was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. MONEY, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, a few days since my colleague [Mr. CLAY] gave notice that to-day I would ask the indulgence of the Senate that I might be permitted to call up Senate joint resolution No. 45, with a view of submitting some remarks thereupon. If I may have the courtesy of the Senate, I desire now to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution introduced by Mr. BACON December 18, 1899, as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war—the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

SEC. 2. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

SEC. 3. That the United States, having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful avocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

SEC. 4. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands, and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

SEC. 5. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy, in the judgment of the United States, to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of the islands to their people.

SEC. 6. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through treaties with the leading nations of the world, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in listening to the reading of the joint resolution I observe that there is one word which is a mistake, and which I ask may be corrected. I think it is possibly in the fourth section. The word "have" occurs where it should be "has." I ask that it may be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MASON in the chair). The Senator from Georgia asks that the correction suggested by him be made.

Mr. BACON. It is a mere misprint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be corrected as requested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the resolutions which have just been read, when reduced to their final analysis, may be said, in case of their adoption, to be a declaration on the part of the United States that it is the purpose and intention of this Government to give to the Philippine Islands the same character of government, the same opportunities, the same assistance, the same right to independence that were pledged in the case of Cuba at the time of the declaration of war against Spain and as are now proposed to be carried out in the case of Cuba.

Mr. President, when we stood before the nations, about to break the peace of the world, we called upon the world to witness the purity of our motives, the absolute unselfishness with which we proceeded in that solemn moment. We declared as follows:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island—except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

I desire to say that I would rather be the author of that resolution, I would rather have the credit that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has in having offered that resolution, than to be the author of any legislative action with which I am familiar within the past quarter of a century. If there is precedent for it in the history of the world, I confess my ignorance of the fact.

In the face of the recognized right of a nation which goes to war, although somewhat inconsistent with modern ideas of civilization and humanity; in the face of the recognized right of a nation when it goes to war not only to fully indemnify itself, but to have that measure of indemnity heaped up and running over, we solemnly abjured the right to avail ourselves of that which is recognized as strictly proper under such circumstances.

Mr. President, were we sincere in that declaration or did we make it for the purpose of deceiving the civilized world? Were we sincere in the declaration that it was not our intention to profit by the war? Were we sincere in the declaration that we undertook this great enterprise from the high motives which are expressed in that resolution? Or did we intend to make the world believe that such was our intention while we at the same time reserved in our own breast the intention to profit in some other direction without putting the world upon notice of our intention in that respect?

Now, Mr. President, it was upon the theory that we were sincere, that we did mean what we said, that we were animated by this high purpose, that we were unselfish, that a little over a year ago I introduced a series of resolutions very similar to those which are now before the Senate. They were introduced in January, 1899. In the succeeding month, when the McEnery resolution was before the Senate, I offered as an amendment thereto in the way of an addendum the following:

Resolved further, That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein, entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

That resolution is a substantial copy of one of the resolutions which I had introduced in the preceding January, resolutions introduced before a gun had ever been fired on either side in the Philippine Islands. The original resolution introduced by me in January never came to a vote, but this particular resolution, offered as an amendment to the McEnery resolutions, did come to a vote, and there was a tie vote in the Senate, the Vice-President casting a vote in the negative.

My purpose in alluding to the resolution at this time is that I may call attention to the difference between the resolutions now offered by me and this resolution, and to state the reason for such difference.

It will be noted that the resolutions now before the Senate provide for the continued effort of the Government of the United States to restore peace and order in the Philippine Islands, and do not propose any action by the United States which looks to the establishment of a government for the Filipinos until such peace and order have been restored.

The present resolutions also provide for action on the part of the United States Government in providing the ways and the means, the methods, by which an independent government is to be established in those islands, whereas the resolution which was formerly before the Senate, and which was voted upon, did not provide for such action on the part of the United States, but looked to the action of the Filipinos themselves, contemplating the recognition of a government to be erected by the Filipinos whenever in the judgment of the United States that government should be found to be entitled to such recognition.

Now, Mr. President, what was proper a year ago is not possible now. A year ago conditions were such that in my opinion it was competent for the United States Government to leave to the Filipinos the work of establishing their government, of so perfecting it that the United States Government would recognize it and would deem it capable of properly performing the functions of government. They at that time had a government. They had a president. They had a parliament. And I will say, in passing, that they had a parliament the proceedings of which were very highly spoken of by persons competent to judge. They had a judiciary; they had an army, and in all particulars they had the machinery of government. They not only had an army in name but they had one in fact. They had an army of efficiency, an army capable of sustaining the civil arm of the government. They had an army of 30,000 men, which invested at that time the city of Manila and kept within it the entire Spanish army while Dewey beleaguered the city by sea. It was an army which in repeated battles, after the naval battle of Manila, had without exception gained victories over the Spanish troops and had captured from the Spanish troops many thousands of prisoners. It was an army which, as stated by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day, was one which absolutely invested the city of Manila by land and extended from water to water on either side.

So I say, Mr. President, while I am not going into the question now of the propriety of the action of the United States Government in reference to that army, speaking solely as to the reason why in my opinion at that time it was proper to leave the question of the organization of their government to the Filipinos, they not only had all of the other framework of government, but they had a powerful, victorious army.

Therefore it was that in the resolution which I offered as an amendment to the McEnery resolution no provision was made, or, rather, suggested, for the action of the United States Government except to judge whether the government which should be framed by them should be a proper government. But in these present resolutions there is provision that the Government of the United States shall take affirmative action. First, that it shall restore peace and order; second, that it shall itself provide the method, the machinery, and give the assistance which may be required to enable the Filipinos to organize a government which shall be a sufficient and a satisfactory government in the opinion of the United States.

Now, why the change? Because, Mr. President, since that time whatever there was of government in the Philippine Islands has been destroyed by the United States Government. Their army has been dispersed; their government has been entirely dispersed; their president and the commander of their army is practically a fugitive in hiding; their army has been practically broken up; their parliament has been destroyed; their courts have been dispersed, and there is no authority in the Philippine Islands to-day worthy of the name of authority except the authority of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is it his information, and if so, I should like to know the source of it, that there are urban or municipal governments over the island of Luzon and the group in the neighborhood, the name of which I have forgotten, which the Filipinos had without dispute? Are those also destroyed, or are they still, in places where the United States does not penetrate, governing their villages and towns in peace and harmony?

Mr. BACON. I am not sufficiently informed to answer the question of the Senator with accuracy. Of course, I presume it to be true that wherever the United States forces have not actually penetrated the people are still carrying on their own municipal governments. But, speaking in a general way, I think the proposition may be properly stated that the United States Government through its military operations has practically overthrown the local governments in those islands, and that wherever they now exist, even in municipalities, it is simply from the fact that temporarily at least there is no presence of the United States troops in those places.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, I will attract his attention to a portion of the report of General Otis, in which he says that on and prior to December 10 Aguinaldo was the dominant power throughout the island and of the government even within the limits of the city of Manila, of which the United States had actual military possession, and that an order issued by Aguinaldo was so potent that it was almost universally obeyed by the Filipino people within the limits of Manila, of which the United States was supposed to have actual and exclusive military occupation.

Mr. BACON. Conceding all that the Senator from Utah says, the only purpose I have in alluding to the fact of the supremacy of the military authority of the United States in those islands is to give the reason why I think the duty now devolves upon the United States Government to restore, as far as possible, perfect peace and order within the islands, and to maintain that peace and order until there shall have been substituted for the government—the military government, if you please—of the United States such local civil government as shall be organized through the assistance of the United States, and as shall be deemed satisfactory and sufficient by the United States.

Of course, I do not desire at this stage, because these are really in the nature of preliminary remarks, to go into the discussion of the questions which are suggested by the interruptions of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Utah.

Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia suspend just a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside until the Senator from Georgia shall have finished his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the unfinished business be laid aside without prejudice. It will be so ordered, without objection. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. I thank the Senator for the courtesy.

Mr. SPOONER. Before the Senator resumes, will it be agreeable to him to permit me to put a question to him?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator made a statement as to the effect of the declarations introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] relative to Cuba. The question which I would like to put to the Senator, with his permission, is this: Whether, in his view, the United States would have been precluded by that declaration from honorably exacting from Spain at the end of the war a money indemnity for the expenses of the war?

Mr. BACON. I do not think we would, Mr. President. I do not think that we would have been barred from other kinds of indemnity for the expenses of the war, but I do think that in good faith the United States stood pledged before the world not to reap advantage from the war. I may, before I get through—I am not sure—have occasion to discuss the question as to whether or not this is an effort on the part of the United States Government to reap advantage, or whether it was a proceeding for the purposes of indemnity.

Mr. President, there are two points of view in a general way from which we should look at the question of the action of the United States Government in the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands. One which has been very much discussed, and which I am free to say I do not think has been by any means exhausted, as able as the discussion has been, is the question of right, the question of justice to the Filipinos, and the question of consistency on the part of the United States in the treatment of the Filipinos, consistency with our avowed, recognized principles for over half a century. That part of the discussion I do not propose to trench upon this afternoon.

Another point of view from which it may be regarded is the question as to the interest of the people of the United States politically and materially, and it is to that part of the question that I wish, with the indulgence of the Senate, to address myself this afternoon.

Mr. President, it will be noted that in these resolutions I have endeavored, as far as possible, to exclude the consideration of questions which might divert attention from the main question. The question is this: When the conditions are ripe, when peace has been restored and the authority of the United States is no longer resisted in the Philippines, shall the United States then accord a free government to the Filipinos, to be independently exercised by them, or shall the United States thereafter retain the possession, dominion, and sovereignty of the Philippine Islands with the view to their permanent retention as a part of the territory of the United States? But before proceeding to that I want to say this: There is some question as to whether or not this is the proper time for us to determine what shall be the ultimate action of the Government of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, and without going into that question at large—because I presume that question will come up more properly probably upon the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] or the bill offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]—I wish to state, however, in order that my view may not be misunderstood, that I think there are two reasons why this matter should receive present attention, not only present attention, Mr. President, but present determination.

In the first place, Mr. President, while it is true that the power of the Filipino army has been broken, while their government has been dispersed, and while, in a general way, we may say that the power of the American forces in the Philippine Islands is supreme, still entire peace has not been restored. If we had a year ago said that we did not design the subjugation of those people; that we did not intend that we should exercise permanent sovereignty over that archipelago, but that in due time, when a government was organized such as the Government of the United States would deem to be sufficient, we intended to leave them to the control of their own affairs, I believe there would have been no bloodshed in those islands. But that is past. It is bootless to discuss what would or would not have been the result or effect at that time of such a declaration. My present belief, however, is that a declaration by this Government now that it does not so intend will bring peace in those islands; that the small and disorganized and irregular resistance to the military power of the United States will be abandoned, because the only excuse for its continuance which they can possibly have to-day is the fact that they understand that the United States Government intends to deny to them the independence which they desire. Therefore I say, in the interest of the cessation of the effusion of blood, I think it important that our action should be taken now and not be postponed to the future.

Another reason, Mr. President, is this: So far as the character of the population is concerned, the conditions in those islands are not such as will be changed within any short period of time—within a generation. Therefore we can approach the subject now with as much certainty as to what the conditions will be ten years from now as we can now know what they are. Do not let me be misunderstood. I mean this: Those are thickly populated islands; they are inhabited by people of a certain race; and ten years from now they will be inhabited by a people of substantially the same kind; there will be no material change. Therefore, as the condition of affairs which will exist then exists now, we can determine as well what we should do as we can determine ten years from now.

Mr. President, as I said, I desire to address the Senate upon the question as to what is the interest of the people of the United States in determining what shall be the future relations between the Philippine Islands and this Government.

We have had in times past extension of territory; and if it be true that this proposed expansion, if you please, will create between the Government of the United States and the Philippine Islands the same class of relations which now exists between the United States and the territory heretofore acquired, then we are in a position to judge whether or not we can safely undertake to continue a permanent political relation with those islands.

It is a question, vast and far-reaching in its consequences, which invokes the most considerate and patriotic judgment by the American people. In the outset of the examination of this question, in order that we may consider and determine it intelligently, it is of vital importance to ascertain the relations which must necessarily thereafter exist between the United States and the Philippine Islands if these islands are permanently retained as a part of the territory of the United States.

Will these islands, if permanently retained, bear thereafter the same relations to the United States as those which are now borne or which have heretofore been borne to the United States by the various acquisitions of territory heretofore made by the United States? If the Philippine Islands do bear now or can bear in the future the same relations to the United States as does the territory acquired from France or that acquired from Mexico, then outside of the question of compulsion, which I am not now considering, there is nothing novel in the proposition for the acquisition and permanent retention of the Philippine Islands other than that arising from distant location. In that case there is nothing which will work a revolution in our system of government, nothing which will subvert and destroy our boasted principles and cherished ideals.

Let us examine and see what are the relations occupied by formerly acquired territory, in order that we may determine whether it is possible that the Philippines can ever bear the same relations to the United States. All the territory acquired through the Louisiana purchase or through the treaties with Mexico, as well as the Florida purchase from Spain, is now divided up into States and Territories. Almost all of it is now divided into States, the people of which enjoy equal rights, privileges, immunities, and powers with the people of the original thirteen States. All of these peoples in all of these new States which have been carved out of the several territories acquired from France, from Mexico, and from Spain before the late war, are joint beneficiaries and joint proprietors with the citizens of the original thirteen States in the great inheritance of personal liberty, and in the rights and powers of equal citizenship, and in the right of the equal influence and authority of their votes in the making of the laws and in the control of the affairs of their several States and of the General Government. The parts of these several acquisitions which have not yet been admitted as States into the Union have been divided into Territories, with the design and certainty that in due time they will also be admitted as States, at which time their people will also have all the rights, privileges, and immunities and exercise all the powers of citizens of other States.

The same is true of Alaska. The time is near at hand when that country will be given a complete Territorial government, and there is no doubt but that in the future it will be admitted as a State in the Union.

All this that has been thus accomplished in the uses made of these several acquisitions in their creation as States, and all that it is intended to accomplish as to the remainder in the future, was anticipated and designed at the times of these acquisitions. This design may be said to have been part in each case of the act of annexation. It was known from the beginning that these countries were so situated geographically, and that their inhabitants would be of such a character and complexion that States could be conveniently carved out of the lands, and that the people of such new States could be safely and advantageously admitted to all the privileges and powers of American citizenship in both State and national affairs. It was foreseen and recognized by the wise and patriotic statesmen who secured these vast and invaluable acquisitions that each of the States to be carved out of them would in their territory and in their people add to the strength, the dignity, and the glory of this great Government made up by the magnificent aggregation of States, each independent of the other, and each peopled by a homogeneous, free, self-reliant, and self-controlling citizenry.

In the acquisition of territory upon our own continent with this design and purpose, and in the practical accomplishment of this design and purpose, there was nothing at war with the design and purpose of the founders of our Government. There was nothing subversive of the principles upon which those founders rested the Government, nothing destructive of their ideals of representative free government which they intended as the spirit and the body of their great creation.

In each of these vast acquisitions, and in the uses made of them, there was expansion, and great expansion. But it was not simply expansion of the territory subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. It was an expansion of territory accompanied by an extension of the same political systems and political institutions which existed in the original States. It was an expansion of territory accompanied by an extension of the system of States inhabited by a people of our own race, a people free and self-governing, and with equal rights with the people in the original States in the making of laws for the control of State and Federal governments.

This in each instance was legitimate expansion. It was legitimate and harmonious growth. It was not revolutionary change. It subverted none of our institutions. It did no violence to our political principles. It destroyed none of our political ideals.

On the contrary, such expansion strengthened our institutions by extending them into other political systems of the same kind. It established our political principles by demonstrating that they were not limited in their application to the people of the original States, but that free, representative, self-controlling government could be safely exercised by all of our race. It vindicated the wisdom of the founders of our dual government, State and Federal, by proving that so long as our political institutions and political systems and political principles were adhered to, this dual government could be safely capable of indefinite expansion, at least within the limits of our own continent.

Such expansion gave promise of perpetuity to our ideals of personal, civil, religious, and political liberty by extending them to all within the acquired territory, as rights sacred and to be denied to none within our free Government.

But is it possible that such expansion can result from our permanent retention of the Philippine Islands? What shall be said of an expansion which is simply an expansion of territory, which does not carry with it an extension of our political system, our political principles, and our political ideals? What shall be said of an expansion by the acquisition of territory where it is not intended that there shall be statehood, and where it is impossible that there can ever be statehood, with the rights of citizenship in a State—where it is not intended, and where it is not possible, that the inhabitants of the acquired territory shall ever be equal participants with ourselves in the making of the laws of the General Government?

Is such expansion as this the harmonious and legitimate growth and development of our political system or is it such a change in our political system as amounts to revolution? If the acquired territory is never to be admitted to statehood, and in the nature of things can never be so admitted, then it must be a dependent and subject colony of the United States. If the people in the acquired territory are never to be admitted into equal participation with us in the making of the laws of the General Government by which they, as well as ourselves, are to be governed, and from their character can never be so admitted, then such people can be none less than vassals and voiceless subjects of the United States.

Revolution means a turning over. In political matters it is used to signify a complete or radical change. There could scarcely be a more complete or radical change in the institutions of a country than a change from a condition where all were free citizens and none were subject vassals, to a condition where in a particular locality all are subject vassals and none are free citizens; a change from a condition where all are allowed through their votes to participate in determining the legislation of the General Government, to a condition in a particular locality where all are made subject to laws in the making of which they are forever denied the privilege of having a voice; a change from a condition in which the people have all the rights, powers, and privileges of sovereign statehood, to a condition where for all time they are to be allowed no governmental organization of their own excepting only such dependent organization as they are permitted to maintain at the will and pleasure of the General Government.

The proposition is not to be successfully controverted that such radical changes in the principles and practices of our Government will constitute a revolution of the most pronounced type.

If, therefore, the acquired territory is to be permanently held without statehood and without the privilege or right of their people to participate directly or indirectly in the enactment of the laws of the General Government by which they are to be governed, and if it is impossible that they can ever be given such privileges and rights, the permanent retention of these islands is an expansion of territory without the extension of our system of government; it is an expansion which destroys to that extent our political principles and our governmental ideals; it is an expansion which is neither the natural growth nor the legitimate development of our system of government, but it is an expansion which is a revolution in that system.

Now, sir, applying these propositions which I have suggested, what are the conceded facts with reference to the Philippines? How is it with regard to the future relations of these islands to the United States if sovereignty is to be permanently maintained therein by the United States? There is no possibility that they can ever become a State of this Union. There is no possibility that a star can be added to the flag which shall represent an Asiatic race 7,000 miles beyond the seas. There is no possibility that we should ever admit to an equal participation in our Government these Asiatic people, so differing from us in race, habits, traditions, interests, laws, and religion, so utterly unassimilable to ourselves. It is impossible that we should ever consent that this Asiatic race should send here Senators and Representatives to participate in the making of laws by which Americans are to be governed, or that they should, in some closely contested election, through their electoral vote, decide who should be the President of the United States.

The conditions which now exist, and which will undoubtedly exist hereafter if we permanently retain the Philippines, make it impossible that they can ever become a State; and to hold them as a subject colony makes necessarily a revolution in our system of government which should not be aided by anyone who is loyal to the principles upon which that system is founded. It is a revolution which requires those who support it to deny the most venerated principles contained in the Declaration of Independence, and compels them to openly challenge and dispute their truth. It is a revolution which tramples under foot the warnings and precepts of Washington's Farewell Address, which we have heretofore reverently read in this Chamber upon each recurring anniversary, and the teachings of which the American people have held as sacred for more than an hundred years.

It is a revolution which utterly scouts and derides the principles which have inspired in us the contemplation of a republican government as a sacred thing, and which has heretofore caused us to make haste to recognize every republican government which has been set up by those who have overthrown any form of monarchical government. It is a revolution which palsies our tongue when we would give voice to our sympathy for any people struggling for liberty anywhere on the earth, and makes us with accusing conscience sit in dumb silence for fear the accusing finger may be pointed at us. Nay, more, Mr. President, it is a revolution which, while it denies liberty to other people, endangers the liberty of our own people.

Senators can not fail to recognize that a people to preserve their own liberties must be true to the principles upon which their liberties rest. They must not only be true to the principles of liberty as applied to themselves and as enjoyed by themselves, but they must be loyal to those principles in according the enjoyment of them to others. The man who teaches his children that they can with propriety violate the Decalogue in dealing with the property of his neighbor and the persons of his neighbor's family can not promote or maintain personal honesty or personal virtue within the precincts of his own household.

Mr. President, this is a most serious phase of this question, one that I fear we are not sufficiently appreciative of, and I may be permitted to dwell somewhat further upon it. I want, however, to say in this connection that I accord to all the absolute, unqualified desire that which is best for the public good. I impugn the motives of no one, and therefore in what I say, while I may use words that are not exactly agreeable, they are not in any manner intended to be offensive.

The advocates of the permanent retention of the Philippines do not like to hear the term "vassal." Nevertheless, one who is the subject of a government in which he has no voice, who only has such liberty as the government may grant him, and which itself may be taken from him at the will of the government, is a vassal. And that is the only political relation the Filipino can ever bear to the United States. The advocates of permanent retention do not like the term "imperialism." Nevertheless, whenever a republic owns outlying provinces, to be held permanently as dependent colonies, never to be admitted as a part of the republic in the control and administration of the government, that republic is to that extent imperial. And, if held permanently, that is the only relation which the Philippine Islands can ever bear to the United States.

Ah, sir, it is true that the terms "vassal" and "imperial" grate on American ears. They are terms expressive of conditions violative of every principle of the free institutions of America. They are terms expressive of conditions utterly at war with the principles which Americans during three generations have drank in with their mothers' milk. Senators and others who can not find argument with which to meet argument have been in the habit of putting this question aside with the reply that the charge of imperialism is all "rot." Men who can not meet argument with argument, men who can not meet a proposition with a logical reply, seek to answer the gravest of propositions with such foolish expressions as that.

To bring about such conditions and make them permanent, which necessarily result in imperialism and vassalage, is, I repeat, to revolutionize the Government, because heretofore we have had no imperial colonies and no vassals, and we have vaunted political principles which have made it impossible that we should have either the one or the other.

Now, sir, I use the term "revolution" because it is the one which properly expresses the fact. The proposition is this: That to permanently retain territory which it is known can never become a State and the people of which it is also known can never be admitted to participation in the legislation and administration either of a State or of the General Government, people who must be ruled by a standing army in their midst, is to work a revolution in the system of government as it has heretofore existed in the United States, a revolution of the most radical and far-reaching character.

There can be no such thing as an imperial republic. It will either be an empire or a republic. Under the name imperial republic, the form of a republic may be preserved; but the soul and spirit of republican institutions will surely die. To speak of an imperial republic, true to republican principles and institutions, is to speak of a free autocracy or a Christian infidel, or a law-abiding lawbreaker.

Sir, in the view which I am now presenting I am not pleading the cause of the Filipinos. I am pleading the cause of Americans, that their Government may not be converted from a republic composed of free States into an imperial government holding vassal and subject colonies, ruled and controlled necessarily by a standing army in their midst. If our free Republic is to be converted into this imperial government, it is not those who are to be held and ruled as vassals in subject colonies who will be the principal sufferers.

I am satisfied that this brief analysis which I have made of the character of this expansion which we have accomplished in the past will be recognized as a correct analysis, because it is one of the chief glories of this country, one which will be recognized and known as long as the history of this country is written, that whereas through much suffering and trial and sacrifice we founded a small republic, made up of an aggregation of colonies which through that sacrifice won their independence, that which we gained in that way we have given to a continent. That liberty, personal, civil, religious, and political, has not been kept for ourselves, but we have freely given it until that personal liberty and those free institutions which were thus achieved for 3,000,000 people are to-day, through our gift, the great heritage of 80,000,000. And no small part of that glory is the fact that during one hundred and sixteen years after the achievement of our independence no man, public or private, in the United States, ever suggested the possibility that we should acquire territory which should be held as subject territory, with the impossibility that there should ever be a State made of such territory, or that we should conquer and subject any people who should be permanently held as vassals and who would be forever denied the rights and powers and privileges of citizenship.

Mr. President, I allude to this with perhaps a little more of detail than I otherwise would, because those who are the advocates of this new imperial expansion are wont to buttress themselves with the argument that they are but proceeding in a line which has been marked out in the past, and that while the greatest names of which we boast in the history of our country are the names of those who have been instrumental in accomplishing this great work of thus extending our free Republic, they are names which these imperialists have now a right to invoke as the authority and the defense for the present proposition to convert this free Republic into an empire, holding distant subject provinces by military force.

I desire to say that the man who compares the proposed expansion, and the effects which must necessarily follow it, to the expansion of the past which has come from the acquisition of the territory acquired from France or from Mexico or from Spain before the late war; the man who says they are alike; the man who says that the one may be taken as the authority and the defense for the other, is either woefully lacking in candor or still more woefully lacking in information, because they are as wide apart as the poles and as different as night is from day.

The one is the expansion and extension of free government and free institutions; the other is the destruction of free institutions and the birth and growth of imperial rule.

Those who disregard and violate the personal and political liberty of a foreign people are but preparing the way for the time when the barriers will be broken down, and the strong among us will oppress and rule with an iron hand and by military power the weak and the defenseless in our own land.

If this revolution were only to affect the Filipinos, we might from a selfish standpoint be content that it should be so. But the controlling fact is that if this revolution is finally accomplished the principal disasters which will accompany it will fall upon ourselves. The view which I have so far presented may be considered by some to be in the nature of an academic discussion. But there are practical evils which will result from this imperial expansion the discussion of which is in no sense academic.

The first feature in which this revolution will definitely and practically manifest itself to the injury of our people will be in the immediate growth of militarism. If it shall be finally determined to permanently retain the Philippine Islands, it is a safe prediction that in less than eighteen months from this date, if the imperialistic programme is continued, the Regular Army of the United States will be increased to 100,000 men.

Now, the proposition which I make, and which I hope I may have the pleasure of hearing a Senator who is in favor of expansion discuss, is that the retention of the Philippine Islands inevitably and necessarily involves a great standing army, presumably at least a hundred thousand men, and under some conditions much larger. We have already had the suggestion of it. If I recollect aright, the message of the President to the last Congress recommended the creation of an army—I do not recollect whether the particular number was stated or not, but it was understood to be a recommendation——

Mr. COCKRELL. A hundred thousand.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Missouri supplies the information that it was a hundred thousand. I was about to say that it was understood that is what was meant. The House of Representatives, in pursuance of that well-known desire, absolutely passed a bill making the Army of the United States not for a time, but for all time until thereafter repealed, 100,000 men. The measure came to this Chamber. Owing to the opposition of leading members of the Senate, the bill was practically defeated, and instead of it the law which now exists was enacted.

No bill to this effect has yet appeared, during this session, in either House of Congress. It probably will not until after the Presidential election; but in the second session of this Congress, after the Presidential election, or in an extra session immediately thereafter, it is not to be doubted that such a bill will be passed and become a law.

The only possible excuse for this radical change will be this revolutionary policy upon which we have embarked. Almost our entire Army is to-day across the seas. The number of soldiers of the Regular Army now remaining within the borders of the United States is a mere handful. There could be no stronger demonstration of the fact that we do not need any large standing army in time of peace. The great and distinguishing feature of difference between the United States and the European governments has been that we have had only a nominal Regular Army, while they have each had a great standing army of hundreds of thousands of men. Our people have themselves controlled and maintained our Government. On the contrary, their governments have controlled their people with the menace of great standing armies. This revolution destroys this difference between us and the European governments and turns us from our peaceful paths into the same road of blood and iron which they have trod since the Dark Ages.

The necessity of controlling the Filipinos and of maintaining the sovereignty of the United States in those islands will be the excuse for this large standing army. And, sir, there is no question that if the islands are to be retained, a large army will be required for all time. There will be no escape then from such necessity. There is no reason to believe that we will find the Filipinos peaceful and submissive subjects. The testimony of our own officers is that they now hate Americans more than they formerly hated the Spaniards. The testimony of our own officers is, further, that they most earnestly desire liberty and independence, for which they have struggled at intervals for more than a century. Lieutenant Gillmore, who has just been released from many months' captivity among them, gives it as his opinion that the present insurrection will last as long as any Tagalos are left. A statement recently copied into the Washington Post from the Chicago Inter-Ocean gives stronger evidence of their love of liberty than any assertion by themselves or by others. It is that in the last struggle with Spain, in 1896, 50,000 Filipinos gave their lives in the cause of liberty. If the accounts are true which we have received, more than one-third that number have fallen in their resistance to the American authorities. A people whose passions and hatred have been thus aroused against us and who are capable of making such sacrifices will not be submissive subjects. Only fear and force will keep them in subjection. If held in subjection against their will, it will be necessary to rule them with an iron hand. This will require a large army constantly on the islands. Their distance from possible reenforcement when needed and the necessity of frequently relieving troops on duty there and of supplying their places with others will require twice as large an army as would be necessary if the islands were near our shores and in a temperate climate.

For while my distinguished friend the Senator from Indiana represents those islands as being extremely salubrious and healthful, that is not the testimony of soldiers who have returned, and that is not the testimony of Professor Worcester, neither in his book, which I have in my desk, nor in his private conversation with me. It may be and doubtless is a pleasant climate for a temporary visit under very favorable conditions, but it is an exceedingly wearing climate, with plagues and tropical diseases. It is one where the constitution breaks under the influence, and in consequence we must not only have a large army there, but we must also have a large army at home for the constant replacing of those who are brought home. So that there will not only be a large army in the Philippines, but also a large army in the United States—not for a little while, but for all time. And the army of 100,000, which now seems to be monstrous, will in a short time be increased to 200,000.

The fact is not to be denied or disguised, Mr. President, that there are great and powerful influences in this country which for their own purposes desire a great standing army, irrespective of the need of troops in the Philippine Islands; and there is every reason to believe that there are those among them who are ardently pressing on this revolutionary project of holding subject and vassal colonies because of the certain assurances which it gives of a great and increasing standing army. Some of them have not hesitated to say that they wish a large standing army to control our own people. There can be no greater danger to republican government, there can be no greater menace to personal liberty and free institutions, than a great standing army in time of peace. A great standing army is the unvarying and ever-ready instrument with which liberty is destroyed. It is the weapon with which the freeman is subjected to the vassal, and with which the vassal is kept in base submission to his lord. It is the mailed hand of every tyrant; it is the voracious consumer of the hard tribute wrung from the industries and labor of the land; it is the oppressor and the burden of the great masses of the people.

Sir, there are in this hitherto favored land millions of those who have left their native land to escape the curse and the burden of great standing armies. And now shall this great monster, to escape which they crossed the seas, rise up before them here to consume their substance and bar their progress and that of their children in the enjoyment of personal liberty and free institutions?

Sir, among all classes of the American people there is no sentiment more universal than honor and admiration for the American soldier. In every conflict from colonial times to the present, in foreign or domestic wars, on whichever side he has been ranged, he has shed imperishable glory on American manhood.

Our small standing army has ever had the pride and affection of our people. It has never been to them either an oppressor or a burden. It has stood as the emblem and the nucleus of the gigantic reserve military power of the nation. It has ever been fondly regarded as the type, the exemplar for the great army of citizen soldiery ever ready to spring to arms at the nation's call. Thus I would ever have it remain. That it may so remain, it is necessary that we should maintain the condition under free institutions where no great standing army is required to dominate and rule any people within the jurisdiction of the United States. In order that it should so ever remain in the pride and affection of the American people, it is necessary that our Government should continue to be one of the people and not be converted into a government ruling the people with an army. I want no territory permanently annexed to the United States in which the conditions are such that it is a fact beyond the possibility of successful dispute that not only for a while, but for all time the authority of the United States must be maintained only through the power of a great standing army, enforcing the submission and obedience of an unwilling people.

Mr. President, I spoke about practical matters, and I asked that in the progress of this debate Senators would come squarely up in argument and meet the proposition whether or not the retention of these islands in the relation which they must bear to this Government was or was not revolution, and not simply meet it by assertion. Now, I have a more practical request to make of Senators who are in favor of the retention of these islands. The people are entitled to know what is going to be the cost of retention, and I ask Senators who are going to reply, not to my argument in particular, but Senators who are going to discuss this question upon the high plane of argument which should be had in this Chamber, to answer two questions: Is it or is it not true that the retention of the Philippine Islands necessitates a great standing army? And second, in the absence of the retention of the Philippine Islands, is a great standing army necessary? If Senators answer the first proposition in the negative, that a great standing army will not be made necessary by the retention of the Philippine Islands, I want them to tell us how it is going to be done without it. England, I think, has over 100,000 men, if I am not mistaken, certainly approximating that number, in India. She has to keep them there all the time, and although we see in the newspapers announcements of the loyalty of the Indian population, she does not dare to take that army away from there in this day of her trial and need.

Mr. President, another practical matter is this, and I hope that when Senators come to discuss it they will meet it, or at least give us the information that we think is proper. I am not as apt at quoting Scripture as my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but there is somewhere in the Bible a very wise statement that the man who goes to war sits down and counts his enemies and counts what is necessary in order that he may meet him. Of course, this is not a literal statement of it, but that is the idea of what is there. I say when we come face to face with the great question whether or not we shall retain permanently the Philippine Islands, it is the duty of Senators on this floor who are going to determine this question by their votes to count the cost and let the people know not only what they think is to be the cost of war, but what is to be the conclusion, and upon that estimate to give the people the information upon which they can base their action. And in pursuance of that I say not only is there the practical question of a great standing army in time of peace, but the much greater army, the much greater naval armament, which is going to be made necessary by the fact that we are going to be in constant danger of entanglements in foreign wars.

Another certain consequence of this revolution in the principles and structure of our Government will be the liability and probability of disastrous wars of which we have not hitherto stood in danger. There is no government on this Western Hemisphere which will ever have either the inclination or the ability to make war upon us. There can not be the slightest danger of war from that source. With an ocean on each side of us it would be practically impossible for any government in the Eastern Hemisphere to transport an army to our shores large enough to make a pretense of an attack upon us. With the money expended in a few years in the Philippine Islands, in keeping an army there and in fortifying the islands, devoted to the fortification of our seacoast, we would be invulnerable against an attack from any foreign navy. So that with conditions hereafter continued as they have heretofore existed we are absolutely safe from liability to foreign wars unless we ourselves elect to make them. With our geographical situation, and with the observance of our policy of not interfering in questions and quarrels which do not relate to the concerns of this hemisphere, we can absolutely command the peace for our country. Even if there arose cause of war, any European government would be extremely reluctant to declare war against us, because of the impossibility of successfully making war upon us.

But if the Philippine Islands become a part of our possessions there will be two most important results.

First. Omitting the discussion of the question whether we will thereby forfeit the right to insist thereafter upon the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, we will necessarily become complicated in the contentions and competitions and rivalries of the European governments, and from these complications there will be constant dangers that wars will be thrust upon us which we can not honorably decline. There could be no greater folly than for the American people to throw away this immunity from war.

Second. We will no longer be impregnable in a war with a European power. We broke the power of Spain without ever sending a ship across the Atlantic or landing a soldier on her shores. The Philippines and Cuba furnished theaters for the war where she could not successfully defend herself. The Philippine Islands will, if they become a part of our territory, in like manner furnish to an enemy a field for the war where, by reason of the great distance across the sea, we will be exceedingly weak and painfully vulnerable. That will be our weak spot, and that will be the point of attack by our enemies because it is the weak spot. All of our troops, all our munitions of war, and all of our supplies must be transported over 7,000 miles of water. Every transport carrying troops or supplies must be convoyed by a naval force strong enough to resist the entire naval force of the enemy in those waters, because it can not be anticipated which transport will be attacked by that entire naval force. In a war with a European power, with the Philippines chosen as the theater of active operations, the possibility of the disasters which would befall us on the water and on the land, and the humiliation which would overwhelm us in such a case, are appalling to contemplate. Even though no war vessel of our enemy had appeared in Pacific waters, it would be necessary for us to concentrate there practically all of our Navy to convoy and protect the transports which carried our troops, because it would be impossible to anticipate when hostile ships would appear in that ocean through the Suez Canal.

Mr. President, the power which could make no successful war against us by invading us here—the power which would be deterred from even the thought of making war against us because she knew she could not be successful in it, can unhesitatingly make war against us upon slight provocation whenever it suits her interest to do so, because she knows she can carry on that war against us in the Philippine Islands, where we are weak, where necessarily, 7,000 miles away, we shall have to be weak, and where we would be as much humiliated by defeat as the British Government is today humiliated by the terrible chastisement which she is receiving at the hands of a mere handful of farmers.

Is this a fanciful matter or is it a real matter? Is it a fact that we are setting an outpost, 7,000 miles away, where it would be extremely difficult for us to meet even a vastly inferior enemy, or is this simply a mere fanciful picture?

Now, Mr. President, there are other practical matters——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me before he leaves that point, I call his attention to the fact that those people there, with the government which we propose to give them, would be the allies of any power that might enter into war with us. All the nation at war with us would have to do would be to furnish the Filipinos arms and we would have another rebellion on our hands such as we are now putting down.

Mr. BACON. The suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina is very pertinent, and I think the conclusion to which he arrives is certainly one with which no one can reasonably take issue. We have no reason to believe that those people, if accounts are true, would hereafter be our allies.

Again, with our Navy necessarily concentrated in the Pacific Ocean, our long seacoast on the Atlantic and on the Gulf must depend upon its land defenses to repel the attacks of the enemy's ships. With few exceptions, our seaports are not adequately fortified to resist modern artillery. A vast sum of money is necessary to properly fortify our 4,000 miles of coast, stretching from the Rio Grande to Nova Scotia. With the immense annual expenditure required by the permanent annexation of the Philippines, not only for the Army and Navy, but for necessary fortifications, it will be impracticable to furnish the great sums of money to adequately fortify against the power of modern guns this long seacoast. Without such fortifications along our coast, the first sound of war would necessarily bring apprehension and fear and danger to the people at every exposed and undefended point. Two years have not passed since along our entire Atlantic and Gulf coast the people were importuning their Senators and Representatives, and they in turn were besieging the War Department, to give them some means of defense against the bombardment of the Spanish fleet, which they daily and nightly expected.

I remember, sir, one incident which was told in the papers which illustrated the nervous apprehension which existed at that time. The news of one of our victories reached an Atlantic coast city at some time during one night. Before the news was generally known some enthusiastic citizens ran out an old cannon and began firing it in honor of the victory. The citizens, awakened from their sleep by the roaring gun, rushed frantically from their beds into the streets, thinking that the Spanish fleet had arrived and that the much-dreaded bombardment of their unfortified and undefended city had begun. And the next morning a newspaper published in that city contained an indignant protest against the firing of cannon by anyone at such a time, when such noises would so alarm the people. And what was true of that city is true to-day of a large part of our seacoast in that it is undefended by adequate batteries and guns.

Mr. ALDRICH. It must have been in Georgia.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; it was not south of New York. Now you can fix the locality if you wish. And it was not a hundred miles from Rhode Island, where the Senator lives.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it was a good many hundred miles from there.

Mr. BACON. Speaking for my own State, I know it to be true that there is not a city or town on the coast which could not be bombarded by a man-of-war which could approach it by a water course where there are now no fortifications and no modern guns. And if this distant imperial colonization scheme is to be permanently adhered to, our seacoast must remain in an undefended condition. If these hundreds of millions of dollars are to be expended on account of the Philippines it will be impossible to provide the money to defray other necessary expenses of the Government and also necessary to properly fortify our long stretch of seacoast.

And thus it is that this new and revolutionary policy, while it will engender complications and disputes out of which wars are likely to arise, and while it will invite attack upon our distant territories difficult of defense, it will at the same time consume the money which would otherwise be available for the proper fortification of our own cities and towns.

Mr. President, are these dangers to which we should shut our eyes? Can we, in dealing with so grave a matter, fraught with such fearful possibilities and consequences to our people, put aside the issue with the assertion that there will be no war, or that there is little probability of war? There will be no war? If that is so certain, why these millions annually expended to build up a great navy? Why these coaling stations all over the world that we are seeking to secure? Why the vast armaments of all kinds? If no probability of wars, why the ever-growing navy of battle ships and the demand for the great fortifications to resist modern cannon? They all testify to the recognition and consciousness of the danger of wars.

Sir, when the eyes are blinded with the glitter and the glare, when the blood leaps and the pulses throb under the excitement of victorious war, it seems almost a profanation to break in upon the most ardent and exalted emotions with the suggestion that, if we shut our eyes to common prudence, there is danger that, brave and heroic and self-sacrificing as we may be and will be, the intoxicated victors may at some time become the humiliated victims of disaster.

Mr. President, public affairs move now in the world with quick development. A condition of peace to-day may to-morrow be converted into a state of war with some European power. Especially is this sudden change within the range of reasonable possibility since we have flung aside the safe and prudent policy of a hundred years, enjoined by Washington, and needlessly and rashly projected ourselves into a field where we necessarily become entangled in the complications of European international disputes and rivalries. Almost all of our Army to-day is in Asia, on the other side of the globe. A very large part of our Navy is in Asiatic waters. It is only six days' sail from Europe to our Atlantic coast. It is almost as many weeks' sail from Manila to New York or Norfolk or Savannah.

If our new Navy, small as it is, were in Atlantic waters, it could be depended upon in large measure to defend our coasts. But with our Army and Navy in the Philippines, and with our long seacoast comparatively undefended by fortifications, will any Senator endeavor to realize and appreciate the plight we would be in if we should become involved in a war with a European power? Extemporized earthworks will not suffice for defense as in former times. We must have fortifications sufficient to resist the projectile capable of penetrating more than 30 feet of solid concrete masonry. I doubt not that in such an emergency our people would be found equal to the occasion. I doubt not that with a splendid heroism which has ever characterized them, Americans would successfully defend their soil. But it would be at a sacrifice of life and property immeasurably increased by reason of the absence of our Army and Navy in Asia.

Again, sir, if under the argument of the imperialists the Philippines are to be permanently retained, then for the same reason other countries of similar kind must also be taken so soon as we can force the opportunity. The argument is that the Philippines are rich in natural resources; that on this account they are valuable, and that therefore we must subject them to our rule and keep them as a part of our permanent imperial dominion. But why in this majestic march to imperial power should we stop at the Philippines? The same thing is true of the other tropical islands. The same wealth of resource is found in greater profusion in the feeble republics of Central America. In still greater profusion it is found in the republics of South America, only less feeble than the republics of Central America. In all these lands there is the exuberant wealth of the mines, of the forests, and of the soil. Why should the wide reach and grasp for imperial wealth be stayed before all these lands have been added to our imperial dominion? Why should eloquence halt in stirring the blood of Americans with the portrayal of the spoils of an empire limited to the paltry area of the Philippines, when there is the loftier theme, the wider vision, of the immeasurable spoil of an empire extended over the unwilling and conquered people of Central and South America? Do you tell me this is extravagant? I admit it. Not only extravagant, but to me the possibility of its realization absolutely repellant and abhorrent.

And yet, sir, I submit a proposition in this connection the truth of which no Senator will deny. If three years ago, in January, 1897, a Senator had in his place here predicted that before January, 1900, the United States would have sent across the Pacific Ocean an army of nearly 100,000 men and a great navy; that they would with this great army and navy have conquered and subjected to our rule a community of 10,000,000 of Asiatic people, and that the country of that people would have been annexed as a part of the territory of the United States, never to be possibly a State, but always a colony, and the people never to be possibly citizens, but always vassals, and that to accomplish this over $150,000,000 would have been spent and over 20,000 lives would have been sacrificed; and if he had further predicted that to defend and justify such subjugation and annexation, not only one Senator, but many Senators would have said in the Senate that the principles announced in the Declaration of Independence were untrue; that the counsels and warnings of Washington in his Farewell Address were no longer worthy of respect, and that the Constitution of the United States had become antiquated and out of date, a mere piece of waste paper, to be trampled under foot or thrown out of the window whenever it stood in the way of the majority—if these things had been predicted three years ago they would not only have been regarded as extravagant, but the Senator who made the prediction would in all probability have been sent to the madhouse.

And yet, sir, all these things, so extravagant and so impossible; all these things and more, things in their details more repellant and more abhorrent, have occurred within the three years. Looking back at these occurrences, does anyone believe that the greed for spoil and the lust for dominion will be sated with the acquisition of the Philippines? Why should they? What reason is there which calls in one case which will not prompt in another?

No, Mr. President, unless met by superior power, there is no halt to the imperial tread when once it starts upon its conquering and its despoiling march. Until it meets with disaster it can only be stayed by the command of the people, and then only when such command is given before; in the decay of free institutions they lose their power to command. The thirst for empire is like the desire for human blood, which is stirred to an unquenchable and maddening thirst in the veins of every man who tastes it. The cry will be "More!" "More!" It was a long step into the middle of the sea to take Hawaii. It was a much longer step across the widest of all the oceans to take the Philippines. From there across to the continent of Asia is a much shorter step. Everywhere the bounties which Providence has bestowed on foreign nations invite the greed for spoil and the lust for dominion. To the hunger for the spoils of foreign lands there is no satiety; to their acquisition there is no limit save the limit of our power.

And thus, from step to step, the march of empire will go on, and as a necessary inevitable consequence a growing standing army, not of 100,000 or of 200,000, but of 400,000 or half a million of men, and an annual expenditure, drawn from the taxes paid by the people, the magnitude of which one would now scarcely venture to suggest. If we undertake to copy the policies of Europe we must bear like burdens with them, and in prosecuting such policies in the rivalries of extending empire and holding vassal colonies each of the European Governments to-day supports an army in time of peace numbered by several hundreds of thousands of men.

Mr. President, it is not a pleasant thing to suggest that there may be a limit beyond which the United States may not safely go. It is a much easier task to tickle the ear of the American people with high-flown panegyrics of the possibilities of their achievements, and to excite their pride and enthusiasm in the glittering recital of the dazzling dream of empire. But those officially charged with the responsibility of the peace, the safety, and the future of a great nation, and with the duty of the preservation of its principles and its institutions, will find the discharge of their highest duty not always in the field most inviting to personal gratification and pleasing to the love of personal applause, but they will find that duty more frequently in the less inviting task of soberly saying things which are true, things not so pleasant for the people to hear, things not so stimulating to their enthusiasm and their hasty applause, but things the knowledge of which will guard them from great dangers and remediless disasters.

But, sir, it is not simply in the contemplation of the possibility of a war entailing great sacrifices and possible reverses that I am opposed to a policy which will bring wars. I am opposed to a policy which will induce and invite wars, even if it could be certainly known that they would be victorious wars. War, at best, even victorious war in a righteous cause, is a great curse. It always works a change in the civil institutions of a free country and endangers the liberties of the people. It accustoms the people to the exercise of arbitrary power and weakens their loyalty to the authority of law. It familiarizes them with the contemplation of blood and carnage. It brutalizes their instincts and destroys the gentler and nobler humanities. Its baneful influence even invades the pulpit, and, strangely, some of those called to minister to holy things to-day endeavor to present the good God as a God delighting in war and bloodshed, forgetting that the new dispensation was ushered in with the divine message of "peace on earth and good will toward men," and not remembering that even under the old dispensation we are told that David was not allowed to build the temple because he was a man of blood.

One of the greatest of the American generals has said that "War is hell." No three words ever more graphically expressed a fact. War means villages and hamlets burned. It means homes despoiled and a country devastated. It means the rent and torn bodies of unnumbered men with like capacity with ourselves for pain and suffering. It means the desolated home, the broken hearts, and the ruined lives of those to whom these men were dear.

Ah, Mr. President, I wish those who so flippantly talk about war, those who read in the morning papers with so much unconcern that a thousand men, ten thousand men, had been killed or that a village, half a dozen villages, had been burned, could see one battlefield after the noise had gone, the excitement was over, and there was only the wreck and the anguish and the destruction of men; ah, sir, I wish in my heart that it were practicable that the twenty-odd thousand men who, I presume, in the Philippine Islands have been destroyed on one side and the other, could be laid out on a plain and the people of the United States could march by and look at them. There would be no more war—none whatever—except where honor or defense requires it. There would be no wars of aggression and subjugation. Only the man who has seen it can realize the horrors of such a sight.

But, Mr. President, let that pass; I did not intend to say this.

I must be brief, as I understand the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to speak this afternoon. He shakes his head.

Several SENATORS. It is the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. BERRY. Take all the time you want.

Mr. BACON. I am much obliged.

Mr. President, the people in the United States of to-day know less of war than those of thirty-five years ago; and the people of the North, as closely as the great war of that time came to their homes and firesides, know much less of it than the people of the South. Because they know what war is, they are opposed to unnecessary war. And yet, sir, the people of my section, as much as they deprecate war, recognize that wars are sometimes necessary and that there are some things worse than war. They recognize that the loss of national honor is worse than war; they recognize that no war is too great a sacrifice to secure and protect liberty; and, what is more, whenever the country is engaged in war they give it their active support, regardless of whether it is or is not a war which they approve. If the published reports are correct, the State which in proportion to its population furnished the greatest number of soldiers for the late war was the State of Georgia. And although her people in general deprecate and deplore the present war in the Philippines and believe it could have been and should have been avoided, it is nevertheless true that about two-thirds of the men of one of the volunteer regiments raised during the past year for that service, and now serving in the Philippines, were enlisted in Georgia.

The universal sentiment among our people is that when the country is at war, even if they do not approve the war, it must be supported and that the soldiers doing their duty at the front must also be supported. This general sentiment is reflected in a recent utterance of the Atlanta Journal, which is one of the most outspoken papers in the State in opposition to a war of conquest in the Philippines. In a recent issue the paper said:

> As a matter of fact, there are a large number of Georgians in the Philippines, and they are doing their duty like the soldiers that they are, as they see it. Wilcoxon, Lockett, Kendrick, and others are Georgians, and in addition there are seven or eight hundred Georgians who went out with the Twenty-ninth Regiment.
> For them the people have nothing but praise. Georgians would not have Georgians in the Philippines abate one tithe of their efforts in their plain duty in the field.

And in a recent speech delivered at Buffalo, N. Y., by the Hon. Clark Howell, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, he used the following language:

> Personally I have thought, and still think, that had we coupled with the ratification of the peace treaty an assurance in the nature of the declaration made for Cuban independence, there would have been no serious disturbance in the Philippines and that we would now be in the peaceful possession of the archipelago, as we are in control of Cuba. I believe it is not too late, even now, to make that broad declaration of our policy, assuring domestic control of internal affairs, combined with the guaranty of independence whenever, in the opinion of this Government, the Filipinos are able to administer a government which will protect life, secure property, maintain law and order, and meet the demands of civilization.

These two utterances combined, in my opinion, reflect the sentiment of the people of my State. They may be summed up in the statement that under present conditions, so long as the war lasts, the Army must be supported in its operations, but that when peace has been restored the Filipinos, in due time, must be allowed an independent government of their own. But, sir, while our people are ready to meet war when it comes, and to do always their full duty in every war, they do not desire war, and do not desire the governmental policies which will invite wars by entangling us in the disputes and contentions of monarchical Europe.

As for myself, sir, among those soldiers from my State now in the Philippines are my personal friends and the sons of my personal friends. And, sir, I need no taunt to urge me on to my duty to these soldiers; much less do I need or heed any from the advocates of an imperial policy of aggression and conquest which will forever thereafter make us liable to frequently recurring devastating wars and cost us the blood of tens of thousands of those same soldiers for whom they are now so solicitous.

But, sir, a great standing army and the wars which will result from the imperial policy are only some of its evils. Another of no unusual importance is the immense money cost to the people. In addition to the $20,000,000, the cost to the United States of the Philippines has already been not less than $150,000,000, while in the opinion of many who have examined into it it is nearer $200,000,000. But taking it at one hundred and fifty million, this is a stupendous sum of money. Every dollar of it has been paid by the American people, and every man in the country has contributed to it his share under the law. We can best appreciate the cost by dividing it up and thus be able to see what the cost has been to a single community or State. In my own State of Georgia a fair calculation will make a cost of more than $3,500,000, which has already been paid by the people of the State as their part of the expense of the war in the Philippines.

To permanently retain the islands will annually cost the United States more than $100,000,000. The large increase in the standing army will alone annually cost that, and that will by no means be all of the expense. On the contrary, it will probably be as much more. But taking it at $100,000,000, the cost annually to the people of Georgia will be more than $2,000,000.

Let no man deceive himself, Mr. President, with the thought that somebody else pays this and that he does not. Every man pays his part, and unfortunately the man of small means pays almost, if not quite, as much as a man of large wealth, for the tax is paid on what a man and his family consume and not upon the value of his property. If this vast sum of money were collected directly out of the people for the purpose of holding the Philippines, it would make a revolution; but while collected indirectly, in the end the result is the same. If one has a dollar filched from him every day, each day's loss may not be seriously felt; but at the end of the year he is $365 out of pocket. So if the people of the State of Georgia have already paid over $3,500,000 for the Philippines, there is that much less money in the pockets of the people of the State than there otherwise would have been. And if they are annually hereafter to pay over $2,000,000 as their part of the expense of retaining the Philippines, then at the end of each year there will be at least $2,000,000 less in the pockets of the people of the State of Georgia than there would be if the United States did not seek to permanently retain that part of Asia. To this must be added another inevitable, certain expense of great magnitude. We have already sent nearly a hundred thousand soldiers to the Philippines. Of those who survive, nine-tenths of them will in a few years be on the pension roll on account of permanent injuries to health due to service in that climate. Our pension roll, now calling for nearly $150,000,000, will soon be $200,000,000. Every year that our Army is kept in the Philippines will add to the amount for pensions. This means not a yearly expense for a few years, but for fifty years. We are to-day still paying pensions to Revolutionary pensioners, a hundred and eighteen years after the close of the war.

Mr. President, this is no fanciful picture. They are plain facts which can not be successfully controverted. This large aggregate expense must be met by the people of the United States. It can not be met by the revenues from the islands. We can not collect a tribute from them, and the revenues from the islands will never pay more than enough to defray the expense of administering their government. Their entire imports have heretofore amounted to only about $10,000,000. The imports are now being stimulated by the large American army stationed there; but even if largely increased under American government, it is impossible that within a great many years the increase could be sufficient to yield any large revenue from imports.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from Georgia, I believe, did as much as anyone else to bring on the war, did he not?

Mr. BACON. No, sir; the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought the Senator from Georgia was one of the Senators who favored the war.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; and I am glad that the Senator gives me the opportunity to state my position, as I have previously done in the Senate. The President of the United States would give the Senator a very different statement from that which he has made. When war was threatening, after the blowing up of the Maine, I had a conference with the President of the United States by his invitation, and he will testify that I was extremely opposed to the war, and I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], with whom I had a conversation relative to my interview with the President, can state the same thing.

As the Senator has suggested the question, I will say that I did vote for the war resolutions, but I did everything on earth I could to prevent the war. I believed it would be a great curse. I apprehended that if sacrifice was to come, it would fall unequally in greater burdens upon my own people. I believed that it would be a great curse to this country; and so I was opposed to that war. But, Mr. President, when it was evident that there would be war, when it was inevitable that we were going to fling down the gage of battle, I thought it was the duty of all of us to present an unbroken front to the world, and consequently I voted for the resolutions, and for that reason alone. From that day to this, so far from having changed the view which I had, my conviction has remained that there ought not to have been any war; and the greatest political regret of my life is that there was war, because I think it is going to result—I fear it will result—in a very material revolution in the political institutions of this country.

In regard to the matter of expense, each Senator can figure it out for himself. I give the rule by which I have gone, so that if I am wrong I can be corrected.

Federal taxation in this country is not based on property; it is based on consumption. And whenever a people in any part of these United States consume the average, then an easy calculation is to consider the expense as one which falls nearly or quite per capita. I am quite sure the people of my section consume their full average, because they have from all time been known as a people of very liberal expenditure. So each Senator here, if my rule is correct, can figure out the cost to his own people, and tell them not only what it has cost, but what it is going to cost in the future, because it is an utter impossibility—certainly an impossibility if a large standing army is to be the result, a standing army which would otherwise be unnecessary—it is utterly impossible that the cost of the retention of the Philippine Islands can be less, directly and indirectly, than $100,000,000 a year, of which the people of Georgia will pay over $2,000,000 each year.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me a moment.

That being the cost each year to the people of Georgia, I repeat, that the United States Government has already spent from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 on the Philippine war, of which the people of Georgia have paid over $3,500,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will not confuse in his mind, or has not confused in his mind, the cost of the Spanish war with the cost of the Philippine war.

Mr. BACON. No; I have not.

Mr. TILLMAN. When we got through with Spain we could have stopped the war expenditures and have gone back to our old traditions.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. TILLMAN. But we have gone off into this new departure, and all this additional expenditure has no connection with the Spanish war.

Mr. BACON. None whatever.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the statement he has made. Unless he corrects his language he may be misconstrued by some people. He said he voted for the war reluctantly. He meant he voted for the Spanish war; but nobody had any opportunity to vote for the present Philippine war.

Mr. BACON. Of course I supposed that everybody understood the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], when he asked me the question, to allude to the Spanish war. I ask the Senator if he did not?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are not engaged in a war with Spain and have not been for eighteen months.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from West Virginia asked me about bringing on the war, and I understood the Senator to refer to the Spanish war.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator is certainly right.

Mr. BACON. Everybody knows I voted against the treaty and should have been very glad if I had had a dozen votes to cast against it instead of one.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. Certainly, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia voted to enlarge the Army——

Mr. BACON. I certainly did.

Mr. SPOONER. In order that the President might, after the ratification of the treaty, employ the forces of the United States in the Philippines?

Mr. BACON. I surely did; and here is the speech I made in the Senate on the subject in the closing days of the last Congress. [Exhibiting.]

Mr. SPOONER. It was a very loyal and patriotic speech.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator has made that remark about it, I shall not read it; but I was about to read a couple of paragraphs from the speech I made on the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator had better read it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Mr. President, in order that the paragraphs which I am about to read may be correctly appreciated, I will state that the first part of the speech is in utter condemnation of the Philippine war, as strongly as I could possibly put it. Then the question was, war being flagrant, whether or not we should vote money and troops, and here is what I said, in part. I beg pardon for alluding to it. I should not read it had not the Senator from South Carolina insisted upon it:

> I conceive that it is our duty as Senators to contend for those measures which we deem to be right and to oppose those measures which we deem to be wrong, to do all that we can to avert war; but when war comes through the action of constitutional authorities—as, for instance, through the making of a treaty by the President and ratification by the Senate—there is but one thing for us to do, and however much we may disapprove of the measures that led to the war, and however strongly we may have striven to prevent those measures, and however much we may be opposed to the war, we must furnish the men and the means required by the Executive for the purpose of carrying it on. Otherwise we would be in a position where the requisite majority did that which involved war and then refused to sustain him with the money and men necessary to carry it on.
> Mr. President, if this were a question where it was proposed as an original act that we should send abroad an invading army, even if it was one which the majority had through constitutional measures determined upon, there might be ground for hesitation in furnishing the men and the means to accomplish the invasion; but it is a very much stronger question, a very much stronger proposition, when war is flagrant, and when we have troops upon the scene of war who must be defended or who must be left to become a sacrifice to those who are in arms against us. There are twenty-odd thousand American troops in the Philippines. They are there in obedience to orders for which they are not responsible. If the war is to continue, they must be supported or left to defeat and death.

Mr. President, to pass from this diversion, there are in addition the inevitable evils attending distant subject colonies—the corruptions of officials, their tyrannies and their cruelties; the insurrections and uprisings of an unwilling people and their bloody suppressions—such as contribute the dark page in the history of every country which has by force dominated and controlled a subject race.

But, Mr. President, it is said that all of the evils I have suggested, and many others not mentioned, will be compensated for in the fact that the possession of the Philippines will open and secure for us the trade of the Orient. It does seem to me that if there ever was an argument absolutely without foundation, it is that argument. If there ever had been anything in it, the agreement which has been reached through the efficient and laudable action of our State Department with the European governments, or the leading European governments whose consent is worth having or desirable, that we shall have equal rights of trade in the Orient forever, makes that as an issue no longer of any importance.

Mr. TELLER. Would it interrupt the Senator from Georgia if I were to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Not in the least.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator what part of the world those treaties relate to?

Mr. BACON. I have only seen the statement in the papers. I presume it is correct, from the fact that I have not only seen the general statement in the papers, but I have seen an interview, which I suppose was authorized, with the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he spoke—I am sorry I have not it here with me—of our having absolutely impartial rights, so far as they could be given by England, Germany, France, Russia, and Italy.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to approve of that?

Mr. BACON. Certainly I do.

Mr. TELLER. Then I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that is a simple partnership which we have gone into to allow those fellows to steal those countries and we are to have part of the pelf?

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me if he understands me to say it was an agreement for a division of territory. Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. TELLER. Is it not substantially an agreement that they may divide without any interference on our part——

Mr. BACON. By no means.

Mr. TELLER. Provided we are let in on part of the theft?

Mr. BACON. I should oppose that most vigorously and unreservedly. I understand the agreement to be, as stated by the Secretary of Agriculture in an interview published in the papers, that there shall be no restriction of trade against us; that so far as they may have any sphere of influence, if you please, they will not attempt to set up against us a closed door, but that we shall have that door for which we are contending as the open door.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion as to what I understand the situation is without interrupting him?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the situation is this: Those great powers have done what the Senator is complaining that we are doing, only to a greater degree and without any possible excuse. As I understand, he approves of an arrangement that we have made that if they will simply allow us to have the same benefit in the transaction that they have we will not complain.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand it in the way the Senator does.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Colorado object to an arrangement under which we shall have the open door to trade in China?

Mr. TELLER. I have not seen the agreement. I do not know what the arrangement is. Upon the statement I have made I surely should object.

Mr. SPOONER. What would the Senator have us do?

Mr. TELLER. I shall not undertake to say that in the time of the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Wisconsin ought to know what I think about it.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand it the way the Senator from Colorado does at all. I understand that we simply have, by the agreement of these various European nations, the same rights of trade in China that they themselves could claim for themselves; no more and no less. I suppose we shall have to pay the same tariffs that are paid by other nations, but that we shall not be excluded——

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. As I understand the point, it is this: Whether the United States or these other governments shall have certain privileges or rights of trade in China would depend somewhat upon the wish or disposition of the Chinese Empire upon that question, and is this arrangement proposed by these powers to the United States to assert and maintain certain privileges of trade in China without regard to the disposition of the Empire?

Mr. BACON. I do not understand that the agreement as made has any reference whatever to any division or disposition. I think I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that I do not understand the arrangement to be what he says it is, which I understand meets his approval.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. It is an arrangement, I think, that these people will respect the treaties we have, and our rights are no greater; they are not enlarged in any way beyond the treaties we already have, not with them, but with the original powers. When they steal this country they are to let the relation that we had with it remain undisturbed.

Mr. BACON. The Senator knows, and I think the Senate knows, that I do not favor the stealing of any country, large or small, even if it is a coral reef, and I certainly do not understand that I am giving my assent to any proposition to steal any territory; but I do not understand that that is involved in the arrangement. I have said, and I am glad to repeat it, that I think the Secretary of State and those acting with him have done a very valuable work, and one which I concede to be of very great advantage to my section of the country as well as to others, and one which I think will relieve the Philippine question of what is a very specious pretense; that through it and through the accomplishment of the permanent annexation of the Philippine Islands we are to enjoy rights of trade in China that we would not otherwise have.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Georgia will permit me. The argument is not that the retention of the Philippines will give us greater rights in China, but greater opportunity to enjoy the rights which may be secured.

Mr. BACON. I understand. I recollect well the honorable Senator's speech upon that subject, that Liverpool is to be transferred to Manila and so forth, which I think is rather sanguine or optimistic.

But to come down to the practical point, I say, in the first place, that under the agreement, as I understand it now to exist, we do not need any help in the Philippine Islands to get into China. I say further that there is not a nation in the world that could afford to make an issue with us on our having equal rights of trade in China. I am not speaking about an issue of arms, but there is not a nation which could make the issue in a peaceful way, to deny us any privilege, from the fact that our trade with each and every one of them is too important for them to run any risk. Whether that is true or not, they have made the agreement. What more than this could we get if we owned every Pacific island and harbor on the Asiatic coast? With this agreement, how much less of the China trade would we get if we did not own a single island on the Asiatic coast?

Is there any room for argument on this proposition? With the equal rights and privileges of all other nations of trade in China, it will simply be a question of our selling the best goods for the least money. And if we do not sell better goods at lower prices, there is nothing in the possession of the Philippines which will the better enable us to compete with other nations which offer better bargains. If the freedom of trade is already assured to us, what possible reason can be advanced why, in order to secure that which we already have without cost, we should permanently retain the Philippines, when to do so necessarily revolutionizes our system of government, requires us to keep up a great standing army, subverts our traditional foreign policy, and involves us in constant danger of foreign wars, and subjects us to annual expense of at least a hundred millions of dollars a year for all the future. What is the logic which can justify this immense cost to secure that which is already ours without cost?

And, Mr. President, even if we did not have this open door in China, the possession of the Philippines, peopled by an alien race, would not secure it for us. So long as we remained at peace the possession of the Philippines would not open the door of China for us. If we went to war with the European powers to try to force open the door of China, the possession of the Philippines, so far from being a strength, would be a weakness to us, as I have endeavored already to show. The only strength to us would be in a few fortified harbors and naval stations, and those we can have without retaining the archipelago. But it is useless to discuss this proposition, because the whole of China is already open to us, and the door is not to be forced.

The simple truth is that it is not necessary to own foreign islands or lands to promote our foreign trade. Our great export trade is to Europe—a trade constantly increasing in great yearly volume. Year before last we sent them over six hundred millions more than we received from them. More than half our agricultural export to Europe goes to England. She buys not only our food stuffs, but a great deal more than half of our cotton crop. To sell her all this we are not required to own any islands on her coast. We sell largely to Germany and France and other European countries, but we own no foot of land on the continent of Europe or any of the islands adjacent thereto, and we never will.

Well, sir, China is as free and open to us as is Europe, and there is no more necessity for an island colony in the one case than in the other. The whole of Central and South America invites our trade. Does anyone contend that we must own islands on their coast to insure that trade? When the Nicaraguan Canal is completed, which we hope will be in the near future, the whole rich west coast of South America will be brought almost to our doors. Will it be necessary, then, to capture or purchase islands on that coast in order to carry on that trade?

If I had time I should like to read here, which I will not burden the Senate with reading, figures of trade at our doors, the South American trade and the Central American trade, all of this being statistics published by the United States. I should like to show furthermore from the same statistics—I have it here—that within ten years, from 1889 to 1899, without owning the Philippine Islands, without owning any islands or any other kind of territory in Asia, our trade with China has increased 256 per cent, and more than that with Japan.

No, Mr. President; the pretense that the Philippines are necessary to our trade in the Orient is a delusion and a snare set to catch the feet of the hasty and the unwary. And those who set the snare, like all others who set snares, are seeking their own selfish advantage. This programme of vast colonial dominion, of which the subjection of the Philippines is but the beginning, may and doubtless will be used to make vast fortunes for the few. A few hundreds, possibly a few thousands, will find therein the schemes which will yield them vast wealth, but the remainder of the people, the tens of millions, will find nothing but the subversion and decay of their institutions, the creation of a great standing army, and the mighty burden of great annual national expenditure.

Again, Mr. President, those who have their own purposes to subserve in the permanent retention of the Philippines, hold up as an inducement the mineral wealth and productive capacity of the islands which will be developed by American capital. In what way are these resources to benefit the great mass of our people? Take, for illustration, the iron business. It is said that there is iron ore there in inexhaustible quantity. It may enrich the few who will invest their money there in the iron business, but how will it benefit the iron producers and their employees in America to have the demand for iron in China supplied from mines and furnaces located in the Philippine Islands? Can the iron furnaces in America in that event any longer compete with the mines and furnaces in the Philippines, with their short transportation and labor at 10 or 15 cents a day?

How is it with the agricultural products? The capacity of the Philippines for the production of sugar is practically unlimited. With that tropical climate and the cheap Asiatic labor, unlimited in supply, organized with American capital and directed by American brains, it would be impossible for the American sugar producer to compete with Philippine sugar.

It has been confidently predicted that the cane-sugar and beet-sugar industry could be so developed in the United States that it would supply the immense quantity consumed in this country. Fond anticipations have been indulged that the day was near at hand when this would be done. But the sugar industry is absolutely doomed in the United States when the sugar business becomes actively developed in the Philippines.

The same thing is true of rice growing and of tobacco culture.

With tropical soil and climate and unlimited cheap Asiatic labor it would be impossible for either rice or tobacco to be grown in America and sold in competition with it. When that time comes, the rice and tobacco culture must be absolutely abandoned in the United States.

As to long-staple cotton, there is no doubt that it can be successfully raised in Luzon. Prof. Dean Worcester so states in his book on the Philippines. In addition, he has stated to me personally that at one time this long-staple cotton was raised successfully in Luzon to supply the needs of the inhabitants, and that its production was continued until the Spaniards compelled them to abandon it and to raise tobacco, out of which they could secure a greater revenue. The production of long-staple cotton in the world is very limited, and the demand for it is correspondingly small. In America it is produced only in the three States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, the largest part of it in Georgia. There is about $5,000,000 worth of it annually imported into this country from Egypt, and that small importation reduces the price of long-staple cotton in the United States 40 per cent or 50 per cent below the price which it would otherwise bring. With such cotton produced in the Philippines with unlimited cheap Asiatic labor, the cultivation of long-staple cotton in the United States must certainly be abandoned.

And so, Mr. President, you may go through the list of mineral and agricultural products in the Philippines. Their development will doubtless enrich the syndicates and the trusts that will invest their capital there for that purpose, but the great masses of the people of the United States, both the employers and the employees whom they are seeking to delude and mislead with the glittering bauble of empire, will have as their compensation the destruction of important, wide-reaching industries, in competition with production by the cheapest and most abundant labor on all the earth.

Mr. ALDRICH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would that proposition be affected by the words "property of the United States," or "under the jurisdiction of the United States"?

Mr. BACON. I think so, in two ways. There is no doubt about the fact that when American money under American law is invested in the island of Luzon it is going to quicken the industries. There is no doubt about the fact that there will be a great deal more long-staple cotton, a great deal more iron work done, a great deal more sugar raised, a great deal more tobacco grown, and a great deal more rice under American auspices than has been produced under Spanish auspices or than would be produced under Philippine auspices if they were allowed to work out their salvation. But that increased production in the Philippines will not appreciably benefit anybody in America except the trusts and syndicates which will engage in such production.

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. BACON. I yield first to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would what the Senator has just stated be an advantage or a disadvantage to the Filipinos?

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking about the interest of the Filipinos. I am speaking to-day about our people. There is plenty to be said about the Filipinos; but I have too much to say about my own people, and I am too much concerned about my own people to waste much time on the Filipinos.

Mr. ALDRICH. I supposed the Senator was speaking from the standpoint of benefiting the Filipinos.

Mr. BACON. No, sir. The Senator did not do me the honor to be present during the first part of my speech, or he would not have made that remark. It is my own people I am concerned about; and I wish the Senator from Rhode Island were more concerned about them, from my standpoint at least. I am concerned about them on account of their political institutions; I am concerned about them on account of their material interests; and I think, from either one standpoint or the other, that it was the greatest mistake in the way of a public act that the Government of the United States has ever proposed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Georgia having answered the question put by the Senator from Rhode Island, may I now ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Are we to understand that the Senator from Georgia does not want the Philippine Islands developed because it will hurt his people?

Mr. BACON. I do not want the Philippine Islands developed at our expense for the purpose of doing that which would be an injury to my people. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, that the Government of the United States shall go into the business of developing the barren and the unfruitful and semibarbarous lands of all the earth at the expense of the people of the United States. We have got business enough of our own at home.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If I understand the position the Senator now takes, it is that the interests of the people of the United States and the advantages to them are to be considered, and not the interests or the advantages of the Filipinos?

Mr. BACON. I say, Mr. President, the Senator would necessarily by that question, if I were to follow it out, carry me into a discussion as to how far we could disregard the rights of others in order to benefit ourselves. I do not propose now to go into such a discussion. I am speaking now without reference to the Filipinos, and have been during the whole afternoon discussing the single question as to what is to the interest of the people of the United States. There might be some things that would be in the interest of the people of the United States and which would be for the disadvantage of the Filipinos of which I would not be in favor if they could only be done at the cost of what I thought was right and just and proper and fair.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would remind the Senator from Georgia that the new doctrine is that charity does not begin at home, but begins abroad. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from South Carolina agree to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I do not agree to that.

Mr. ALDRICH. The difference between the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Georgia in the discussion is that the Senator from South Carolina discussed the question from a humanitarian standpoint for the benefit of the Filipinos, and the Senator from Georgia is discussing from his standpoint the interest of the people of the United States.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Rhode Island, if he desires to reply to the speech of the Senator from South Carolina which was made yesterday, will have his hands quite full without paying any attention to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not mean it to be understood by what I have said in this colloquy that I am indifferent to humanitarian questions or to the rights of people, or to the right of self-government, or to the right of personal liberty, or to the right of free institutions, even where only a humble and feeble nation is concerned, but I do mean to say that I am this afternoon limiting myself to a discussion of what I conceive to be the interest of the people of the United States.

I want to say one word about one other matter. There has been a great deal said to the effect that we are doing what we are in the Philippines, and propose to do that which we have set our heads upon, because, as the result of the war, there was a duty, an obligation, a responsibility, laid upon us that we could not disregard, and that that is the motive; that the motive is to carry to them our free institutions, to give those who are engaged in missionary work a field for their labors, to lift the people up, to do a great Christian and humanitarian act. I am absolutely certain the President of the United States will not say that, and that those who say it for him misrepresent him.

Mr. TILLMAN. He claims to have Divine Providence as his guide in this business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I think he has been entirely misrepresented in that regard. I do not believe he ever said it; and the reason I do not believe it is because we have his own statement as proof to the contrary.

We are not at liberty to say anything about the instructions which were given to the commissioners, except so far as they have been made public. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day alluded to a colloquy which occurred between him and the Senator from Maine, the present Presiding Officer [Mr. FRYE]. I have here before me that colloquy, but I shall only read so much of it for the information of the Senate as will be necessary to remind Senators of the occurrence. This was in open Senate. I will state that it is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 2443, volume 32, part 3, the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session. The Senator from Missouri, speaking of the instructions given by the President to the Peace Commissioners, asked this question of Mr. FRYE:

> Mr. VEST. Was there not a dispatch sent that nothing less than Luzon must be taken?
> Mr. FRYE—
> One of the commissioners—
> The instruction of the President when we started was to take Luzon.

That is the testimony of Mr. FRYE, one of the commissioners. What preceded that? How was that determination of the President to instruct the commissioners to take Luzon reached?

Mr. SPOONER. When was this testimony given?

Mr. BACON. That colloquy occurred February 27, 1899, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] standing right where the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] now is.

What brought the President to give that instruction? Was it to lift up the people of the island of Luzon? Was it to give them all these free institutions? Was it to enfranchise them? Let us see what preceded it.

On the 13th of August, 1898, the President caused a cablegram to be sent by the Navy Department to Admiral Dewey, which said, among other things—now, this is a literal quotation from the cablegram which was published in the report:

The President desires to receive from you any important information you may have of the Philippines; the desirability of the several islands. * * *

Then there is a fragment of a sentence which is not material and which I omit and will put in asterisks to show it is omitted; and then it continues:

And in a naval and commercial sense which would be the most advantageous.

That is the cablegram sent by the direction of the President, signed, if my recollection is right, by Allen, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in which he said the President desires that he send that information. To that Admiral Dewey replied by cablegram, August 20, 1898, and among other things—this is not the entire dispatch; it is one sentence in it—he says:

Luzon is in all respects the most desirable to retain.

I am not making any assault on the President. I never have done so and never expect to. I am simply calling him as a witness. I am simply producing that which the executive department itself communicated to the Senate and what in addition thereto the Senator from Maine himself said in open Senate. Now, what have we? In August, 1898, we have the President of the United States sending a special cablegram inquiring of Admiral Dewey which in a commercial and naval sense is the most desirable island of the archipelago to retain; we have the reply of Dewey that Luzon is in all respects the most desirable; and we have the fact stated by one of the commissioners in open Senate that before they left to enter upon their work as peace commissioners it was not only suggested to them, but they were instructed to take Luzon.

I say those facts make it an absolute and utter impossibility that the President himself could say that the occupation of the archipelago was required because a duty and responsibility resulting from the accidents of war had fallen upon us which we could not evade; because if that duty and responsibility fell at all as to any part of the archipelago, it fell as to all of the archipelago; and if there was a duty and an obligation to uplift one, there was a duty and an obligation to uplift the other. But that is outside the question, because if the motive is to uplift, it will not be preceded by an inquiry as to which is the most desirable and which is the most valuable.

In this connection I am going to read something that has been read before, but I am going to read it again. It is an editorial from the Washington Post. The Washington Post is second to no paper in the United States in the ardor and zeal and ability with which it maintains the proposition that the Philippine Islands should be permanently retained by the United States Government. It is as pronounced and unconditional as it is possible for a paper to be. That paper on the 14th of this month——

Mr. SPOONER. What paper is that?

Mr. BACON. The Washington Post. I have not seen anybody take any issue with it. This is, of course, simply the opinion of the Washington Post. I would not venture myself to say this, but I can put upon the stand as a witness, if you please, somebody who occupies a different relation to this matter from myself—an opposing relation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the date of it?

Mr. BACON. The 14th of January. It is headed "Let us be honest." I think the President is honest, but there are a great many people professing to represent him and who are talking about him who are not entirely candid, to say the least. I am going to read it. I propose to represent him correctly.

Why can not we be honest in our utterances touching the territories we have recently acquired? Really it would save time and trouble, to say nothing of life and treasure, to come out frankly with the announcement that we have annexed these possessions in cold blood, and that we intend to utilize them to our profit and advantage. All this talk about benevolent assimilation; all this hypocritical pretense of anxiety for the moral, social, and intellectual exaltation of the natives; all this transparent parade of responsibility and deep-seated purpose; all this deceives nobody, avails nothing, helps us not an inch in the direction of profit, dignity, and honor. We all know, down in our hearts, that these islands, groups, etc., are important to us only in the ratio of their practical possibilities. We value them by the standard of their commercial usefulness, and by no other. All this gabble about civilizing and uplifting the benighted barbarians of Cuba and Luzon is mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Foolishly or wisely, we want these newly acquired territories, not for any missionary or altruistic purposes, but for the trade, the commerce, the power, and the money there are in them. Why beat about the bush and promise and protest all sorts of things? Why not be honest? It will pay.

As a matter of fact, we are not concerned in the ethical or religious uplifting of the Filipinos. After all, the difference between a breechclout and a starched shirt front is a mere matter of climate and personal opinion. Dishonesty, untruth, crime, and general wickedness are here in our midst—present with us as part of our daily life and growing with our growth. We need not go to the West Indies or the Philippines in search of material for moral rescue. Our own slums abound with opportunities for missionary zeal. Why not tell the truth and say—what is the fact—that we want Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Luzon, together with any other islands in either ocean that may hereafter commend themselves to our appetite, because we believe they will add to our national strength, and because we hope they will some day become purchasers at our bargain counters? We might as well throw off the pious mask and indulge ourselves in a little honest candor. It will cost us nothing, and it may profit much. At any rate, we shall have the comfort and satisfaction of being honest with ourselves and the privilege of looking into the mirror without blushing.

Now, sir, these historical facts of the inquiry made of Dewey, his reply thereto, and the subsequent instruction of the President to the peace commissioners to take Luzon, all fortify and prove the correctness of the statement in this editorial of the object in view in acquiring the Philippine Islands. If, then, the acquisition of the Philippines is not necessary to secure us the trade of China, and if the trade of the Philippine Islands themselves will be insignificant compared with the annual cost of keeping them, what becomes, from a business or humanitarian point of view, of the argument in favor of the permanent retention of these islands?

Again, sir, among the imperialists those who soar on a loftier wing are fond of appealing to the patriotic emotions and pride of the American people by the oft-repeated statement that the results of the Spanish war had made the United States a world power, and that they have now become one of the family of nations! Why, sir, one would suppose from these oft-repeated expressions, that this nation had for a century been kicked and cuffed around among the other nations like a mangy cur, and that it had skulked around afraid to pick up the refuse which its master threw it.

What a wonderful discovery, Mr. President, that the United States have become a world power. Why, sir, when in the result of the Revolutionary war they made good the great Declaration of July 4, 1776, they instantly became the greatest of world powers; the greatest of world powers, sir, because, in spite of the fewness of their numbers and the smallness of their resources, they had not only announced but maintained and secured a great principle thereafter to stand as the menace of every tyrant, the hope and inspiration of every people, however humble, who longed for liberty. This principle, thus maintained and exemplified in the growth of a great and free people, has, in the advancement of the free institutions of the world, been the most potential influence of a hundred years upon the destinies of the world. Just become, sir, a world power—a nation whose flag has never gone down in defeat! Just become a world power, when for seventy-five years it has stood as the guardian of a whole hemisphere and said to the whole world, "Not one step farther on this hemisphere!" and for seventy-five years the whole world has obeyed the command!

And this discovery that we have just become a world power is due to a mere skirmish in which we overcome the weak and decayed power of Spain, when in truth we had so recently, with our own blood, written the history of the greatest and the fiercest and the bloodiest battles of modern times. Why, sir, within your memory there occurred within 80 miles of this Capitol a battle in which more men were killed and wounded in half an hour than were killed and wounded in both American and Spanish armies and navies during the entire Spanish war.

And the highest demonstration that we were a world power was when the division ended, and when there stood again united for all time the people who, when divided, had between themselves fought battles under the shock of which the earth quaked and the very mountains rocked.

No, Mr. President, we do not need to keep the Philippines to prove to the world that we are indeed a world power. There is a meaning to the expression "world power." It has been perverted and has become misunderstood. It originated across the water. They did say it about us. What did they mean? Did they mean they had suddenly discovered that a nation with 10,000,000 fighting men had suddenly become a world power, a nation with such a history as we have? No. What they meant by world power and coming into the family of nations was that before that time we had been a peaceful nation, attending to our business, frowning down upon the conquest of any people, however humble and however feeble they might be, holding up for free institutions; differing from all the rest of the world in the fact that they were always ready for conquest, always ready to oppress the weak, always ready to despoil anyone who might be in their power; and when they saw that we had gone across the ocean to pick up a little feeble people, they raised a hurrah that we had also become a world power among the land grabbers, and had become one of the family of nations to oppress and subject the weak and feeble. Why should we take this departure?

Now, if my distinguished and learned friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will pardon me, I want to say a word about his bill. I am not going to anticipate a discussion upon that measure, but estimating that Senator as I do as a man of ability and of learning and of resources and of conservatism, all of which I know to be accorded him by all in this Chamber, there is nothing which has so impressed me with the belief and the conviction that it is our duty to make now the declaration contained in these resolutions as the bill which he introduced. Why? The bill of the Senator is to give to the President for all time the decision as to what shall be the government for the Philippine Islands, without instruction or limitation from Congress. The conditions in the Philippines——

Mr. SPOONER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill provides nothing of the kind.

Mr. BACON. I will get the Senator to state it. I may be unhappy in my statement.

Mr. SPOONER. It vests in the person or persons appointed by the President——

Mr. BACON. This unlimited power?

Mr. SPOONER. This power until otherwise provided by Congress. It is purely temporary. The Senator said "for all time." I would not support that any more than he would.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it is temporary, because no time is fixed.

Mr. SPOONER. My friend will remember that the time can be fixed any moment Congress sees fit to fix it.

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes; but a statute may be upon the books and it may be an extremely difficult thing to repeal it, as Senators know with respect to various statutes which have been upon the books a long time. I am not attacking the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin; I do not want to discuss the bill of the Senator; but I do say this——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator wants to state it correctly.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I will restate it, although the Senator has stated it, and it is not necessary for me to encumber the RECORD with a restatement of it. It gives to the officers appointed by the President this unlimited power until otherwise directed. Is that what I understand to be the effect of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. If that were a community like Arizona or New Mexico, in which conditions were changing, it might be well to follow the plan which was adopted by the United States Government in that case, where for a certain period similar authority was given to certain parties named; but we know that the conditions are not going to change in the Philippines. We know that there are eight or ten million people in those islands, and in our lifetime there is going to be no change of any particular kind, so far as population is concerned. Whatever change there may be will bear a very small ratio to the entire population.

My proposition is that if conditions now are such that it is impracticable for Congress to make a wiser provision for the government of those islands than that—and the fact that my distinguished and learned and honorable friend can not find anything better than that is the highest evidence, to my mind, that that is the best that can be done—if that is the case, and conditions are such that you have no reason to believe they can be changed within a generation or two generations or three generations, I say it is the very highest argument which could be given to me that this is an enterprise upon which we should not embark, an enterprise from which we should withdraw ourselves as soon as practicable. Because if that is the best form of government that the United States can, under conditions now existing and which will continue to exist for a hundred years, bestow upon the Philippine Islands, there can be no stronger evidence that we should have no permanent connection with the same.

Mr. President, as I was about to say when I was diverted to make the suggestion with reference to the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin, or, rather, to the effect it had upon me—I may vote for it if nothing better is proposed——

Mr. SPOONER. That is the reason why I introduced it.

Mr. BACON. That is the Government of the Russias, though, I will say to the Senator. That is the absolute, the exact Government of the Czar of the Russias. He is an autocrat and he delegates his power to some people.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me to say to him that that was said in 1803 about the Jefferson bill for the government of Louisiana.

Mr. BACON. I think it was a mistake in that case.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. BACON. I think that was a mistake.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, I will reply to the remark of the Senator from Wisconsin. It was a mistake to charge that on Jefferson. The Senator from Wisconsin did not do me the honor to hear the first part of my speech.

Mr. SPOONER. I did.

Mr. BACON. He did not sit where he is sitting now, and I thought he was not in the Chamber, because I was watching that seat. I was very anxious that he should be here.

Mr. SPOONER. While the Senator from Georgia was watching this seat I was watching the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. BACON. Let me answer first. One moment, if the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, and then I will yield.

Mr. FORAKER. It is in connection with this matter, and before he leaves this point I want to call attention to the fact that the same resolution was also adopted, or the same bill passed, in the case of Florida in 1819.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FORAKER. So we have at least two precedents for what is provided in the Senator's bill.

Mr. BACON. That was a very different state of affairs. I think the criticisms on Jefferson and the author of the Florida resolution are altogether unjust, and for this reason: That was manifestly and necessarily and certainly something which would be temporarily ended by a population which would be capable of self-government. The difference in this case is that you are proposing to legislate as to a country where the population can never be allowed here the equal rights of self-government.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to say that the people of the Philippine Archipelago never will be capable of self-government?

Mr. BACON. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the difference, then, between that case and this as to a temporary government?

Mr. BACON. The difference is this: I think the Filipinos will be forever incapable of such self-government——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I was not talking about that.

Mr. BACON. Hold on a moment. I think the Filipinos will be forever incapable of such self-government as would make us willing to admit them into our family of States or to admit them into an equal participation in making the laws by which we are to be governed as well as themselves.

On the other hand, the population which it was known would occupy those Territories would be a population which could be incorporated as States and which could be, as they have been, properly admitted into equal participation with ourselves in the making of the laws and the controlling of the affairs both of the State and Federal Government.

As is suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and by some other friends sitting around me, the country in each of those cases had a sparsely settled population, which would invite immigration and into which immigrants would certainly come, and immigration of a kind of people which we could admit into the participation with us in the control of our State and Federal Government.

Mr. HOAR. Pardon me. There was one inhabitant to 13 square miles; no common government, no common action, no common sentiment, no possibility of gathering together for a government. It was a great waste space.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, his resolution contemplates that we shall remain there until a stable government shall be formed.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly; stable for them, not for us.

Mr. SPOONER. And who is to regulate matters in the meantime?

Mr. BACON. The Government of the United States. So expressly says my resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not different from the other resolution.

Mr. BACON. Oh, by no means different from the resolution of the Senator. I would be very happy if the Senator would just substitute mine for his.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I will not.

Mr. BACON. Because being from the other side of the Chamber, he might get his through.

Mr. SPOONER. I will not.

Mr. BACON. Because mine expressly provides for the maintenance of peace and order and for the action of the Government itself in providing the means, just as we propose to do in Cuba, by which a proper government can be organized, and which when properly organized and properly approved by us shall thereafter be left to the administration of their own people.

Now, Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that only the most enlightened nations can govern themselves. I believe in personal liberty for humble people and, if you please, people who are not upon our plane of civilization. But the one word I want to say before I take my seat——

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator leaves that point——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask him if he thinks that sparseness of population and extent of territory have any bearing on the question of the right of self-government. He alluded to that in connection with the Louisiana Territory. I want to know whether the number of population and extent of territory over which they were roaming or in which they were living had any bearing on the question as to their right of self-government.

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly not. Whenever they reach such a population——

Mr. LODGE. Ah, not——

Mr. BACON. One moment. Until then a temporary government must be provided, of course, just in the same way that we have governments in the Territories which might not participate——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator indicate to me at what point in the census the right of self-government adheres?

Mr. BACON. Probably the Senator will have that to ascertain when he comes to pass upon the question whether or not Arizona shall be admitted as a State or whether New Mexico shall be admitted as a State.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, that is something which can not be laid down by a definite rule of mathematics. It is something to be determined by each legislator for himself when the question is presented, whether there has come a time where there is such a population within the given area that it can be erected either into a Territory or into a State. In the particular case that we have in view it is already populated. It is known—the Senator from Wisconsin knows and the Senator from Massachusetts knows, that not within his lifetime or the lifetime of his grandchildren, if ever, will there be a population in those islands that you can permit to have a government which shall be like the government under which each one of them lives, and where the inhabitants shall enjoy the privileges which he enjoys.

Mr. LODGE. Now, if the Senator will permit me, the point I should like to ask him to make clear to me is this: There were some 30,000 people settled about the mouth of the Mississippi at the time of the Louisiana purchase. The treaty was made and ratified without any allusion to the consent of the governed, and they were governed for some time under an act precisely similar in terms to that introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BACON. I beg your pardon; there was a limit.

Mr. LODGE. There is no limit of time expressed in that act of Jefferson's.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Read and see.

Mr. LODGE. Until Congress passed upon it.

Mr. BACON. Read and see. The Senator will find out he is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. As soon as action is taken at the session; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. The principle is the same.

Mr. LODGE. The principle is the same, I suppose, is it not? Now, why were those 30,000——

Mr. BACON. No; the principle is not the same.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, then, we have the right to deny self-government for a limited time?

Mr. BACON. No, sir; not at all. But we can not accord it until the conditions in the way of population are such as to justify it, just as you do in the Territories.

Mr. SPOONER. If God gave it to everybody, it is not for us to accord.

Mr. BACON. That is not the practical way in which legislators recognize it. On the contrary, we have proceeded from the beginning of this Government upon the theory that until a Territory did have a certain number of people in it it should not have government otherwise accorded.

Mr. LODGE. Why was it all right to take those 30,000 white people at the mouth of the Mississippi, Frenchmen and Spaniards chiefly, without their consent and govern them for a limited period without their consent?

Mr. BACON. Now the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I want to get at the point at which the consent of the governed and fitness for self-government applies.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly the question that the Senator has no right to ask, because if he had been here all the time he would have understood that I had distinctly said I was not going to discuss the question of the rights of the Filipinos, that I was talking about the rights of our own people and interests of our own people. I can not go into that. That is a different discussion altogether.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, the Senator from Massachusetts ought to look at this resolution, which provides that they shall have that right when we say so.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly aware of that, but what I wanted to get at is whether the right of self-government is an abstract right of any man—one or ten thousand or ten million—or whether it is a right to be applied and given only when we or somebody else see fit.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a practical question.

Mr. LODGE. It is a practical question.

Mr. BACON. It is a practical question; and in the beginning of my remarks, when the Senator was not in his seat, I stated that my resolution and these resolutions now under consideration could be, in their final analysis, said to be, if adopted by Congress, a declaration that we will adopt the same means to bring the Filipinos to a condition of self-government that we are now pursuing to bring the Cubans to a condition of self-government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me just one moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me that this whole controversy is answered by the terms of the treaty under which Louisiana was annexed. Article III of the Louisiana treaty provides:

> That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States, and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Wait until I finish. Further than that, when we annexed these islands we instantly passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, etc., That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex the said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States.

Thus marking the line of the complete and absolute departure from every treaty we had heretofore made in the acquisition of territory and adopting an imperial and colonial policy.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator if under our Territorial system the people of our Territories have free government, self-government?

Mr. BACON. I have gone over that. Here is another one of the Senators who goes out and attends to private business or his private pleasures, and then comes in and asks me a question about something I have been over.

Mr. STEWART. It is a question the Senator, I think, could have answered yes or no.

Mr. BACON. No; it takes more than yes or no.

Mr. STEWART. They either have self-government or they do not have it.

Mr. BACON. No; that is a mistake.

Mr. STEWART. They either have it now or do not have it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not formerly think so. He has come to different views from what he formerly had. I do not think the Senator entertained that view himself. The Senator once lived in a Territory.

Mr. STEWART. I did not hear the Senator's remark.

Mr. TILLMAN (to Mr. STEWART). You are a recent convert, he says.

Mr. BACON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART. They either did have free government or they did not have a free government.

Mr. BACON. In a word, now, the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin, both of whom are capable of splitting hairs in very numerous subdivisions, have asked certain questions to which I give one general reply, which I think is sufficient, and it is this: It is recognized everywhere that the rights of a people who are a nation, so far as race goes—I am not speaking now of national organization—a people who are a race, a nation occupying the land, not as a few sparse, roaming individuals or tribes, but filling the land up, are not people subject in any manner to any of the suggestions made by either of the Senators. On the contrary, the Senators, both of them, recognize the fact that not only in this regard but in other regards a land which is sparsely settled by a few roaming people with scarcely any local habitation is not regarded in the same light, either as to the right of a country to take possession of it or as to the right of a country after having taken possession of it to arbitrarily rule it, as it is in the case of a country which is fully inhabited and where the people have their own political institutions.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for making that reply to me, for it defines what I suppose his position to be, that the rights of a man, so far as the consent of the governed goes, depend upon whether he is one of a wandering tribe in a sparsely settled country, and if in a sparsely settled country he is a member of a wandering tribe he has no rights.

Mr. BACON. No; I do not say he has no rights at all.

Mr. LODGE. I mean he has no rights which we are bound to respect.

Mr. BACON. That was what the Massachusetts people said when they landed and fell upon their knees and then fell upon the Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. That is old, but it is good.

Mr. BACON. A good application is always good, and I do not know of any place where it could be so well applied.

Mr. LODGE. I want simply to say that so far as I know it was pretty much the same in all our colonies. When a king who had no right in the land granted land to certain gentlemen who had no right, and they came and took what afterwards became the great State of Georgia, and the answer is that——

Mr. BACON. No; that is a mistake.

Mr. LODGE. They obtained a good right because they were not wandering tribes.

Mr. BACON. No; that is an entire mistake. The Senator is wrong in his premises. The Senator has not done the State of Georgia the honor to read the early history of that State.

Mr. LODGE. I have read the history of Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has never heard of Tomochichi.

Mr. LODGE. I have heard of him.

Mr. BACON. Who was he?

Mr. LODGE. I have always supposed him to have been an Indian chief who played much the same part with the settlers of Georgia that William Penn's Indian is said to have played with him when they measured the land with the runner or the strips of oxhide.

Mr. BACON. No; that is a mistake. The Senator, I am now sure, has not read it and does not know the history of it.

Mr. President, I have been led off——

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator gets away from that I suggest, if he will permit me, that the Declaration of Independence is the best guide we have had hitherto as to what are the rights of a man.

Mr. SPOONER. You do not have it in South Carolina, though. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. In what way?

Mr. SPOONER. The colored man.

Mr. TILLMAN. The colored man under the Declaration of Independence was put on a par with the Indian, and we have never acknowledged that he is fit for self-government, and especially to govern us, and we will not acknowledge it now. Thomas Jefferson did not acknowledge it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate. I have held the floor in deference to the desire of Senators to ask questions.

Mr. TELLER. Before the Senator sits down I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator's proposition does not, as I understand, contemplate an immediate turning over of government to those people.

Mr. BACON. No, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator how long he expects to continue that relation?

Mr. BACON. Just about in the same way that you are doing in Cuba under your resolution. I desire to repeat to the Senator what I said when he was not in his seat. I said in the beginning of my remarks that I would rather be known as the author of the amendment which he made to the resolution which pledged this Government to that disinterested and unselfish act when it stripped itself to go to war than to be the author of any other legislative act which we have had in the last quarter of a century.

Mr. TELLER. I am much obliged to the Senator, but I want him to answer the real question.

Mr. SPOONER. He does not answer your question.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would answer my question.

Mr. BACON. Well, go ahead.

Mr. TELLER. What I want to know is, what is the limit; who is to determine it?

Mr. BACON. The resolution says——

Mr. TELLER. Who is to determine when the time comes?

Mr. BACON. The resolution says who is to determine.

Mr. TELLER. It leaves it, does it not, to the United States?

Mr. BACON. Certainly; it leaves the entire control to the Government, you understand, but it simply declares that when the conditions are ripe——

Mr. SPOONER. In our judgment.

Mr. BACON. In our judgment, when the conditions are ripe. It declares that we do not intend, though, permanent sovereignty. That is put down as a substantive declaration.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, if in our judgment.

Mr. BACON. It does not say it in that way. It says——

Mr. TELLER. Then a condition precedent to yielding to these people the right of self-government is a pacification, I suppose, of the conditions that exist?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. In the meantime what is to be done? Will the Senator tell us that? He is grumbling and finding fault. What is to be done?

Mr. BACON. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I say you have been complaining of the condition of affairs.

Mr. BACON. No; I have not.

Mr. TELLER. After waiting for a pacification which does not exist, now the Senator——

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. TELLER. What is to be done?

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken; I have not been complaining of anything.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator has.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary——

Mr. TELLER. I will omit that. What is to be done? Are we to go on and fight, or are we to quit?

Mr. BACON. The Senator stands here and asks questions which are plainly stated in the resolution. If the Senator will read the resolution——

Mr. TELLER. I have read the resolution very carefully.

Mr. BACON. The resolution expresses it, that as the United States has overthrown the government in those islands—the military and civil authority—it is the duty of the United States Government to restore peace and order——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. BACON. The Government is to maintain peace and order until there has been a government erected there to which that duty can be properly and safely delegated; and then so soon as peace and order are restored, the Government in that case, as in Cuba, will endeavor to provide the means and methods by which a proper government can be established in those islands Then, when that has been done to the satisfaction of the Government, it will leave the control of that government to the people there.

Mr. TELLER. Then that amounts, does it not, if the Senator will allow me to ask him a question, to leaving the matter in the hands of the Executive, just where it is to-day?

Mr. BACON. I think not. In the first place, the important thing, Mr. President, in this resolution is the announcement of the fixed determination of this Government as to what it is going to do so far as the future independence of that people is concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me to ask him, How can we announce what the intention of some future Congress will be?

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado why he made this promise to the Cubans?

Mr. BACON. That is what I was going to ask him.

Mr. BERRY. You want to know why it should be made to the Filipinos. We want to make it to the Filipinos for the same reason.

Mr. TELLER. I am not asking why it should be made to the Filipinos or raising any question about that. The Senator misunderstands entirely the whole premises.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. BERRY. A vote on the resolution, as I understand it, is to show to the world and in the Philippine country that we were honest in our declaration in regard to Cuba, that we did not go into the war for conquest, and that we will treat these people in the same way that we pledged the faith and honor of this nation to treat the Cubans.

Mr. BACON. That is right.

Mr. BERRY. Is that correct?

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit the Senator from Georgia to answer my question?

Mr. BERRY. Provided the Senator from Colorado will agree to it; yes.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I want the Senator to answer.

Mr. BACON. I have been on the witness stand a good long time, and I will endeavor to accommodate myself to the wishes of Senators.

Mr. SPOONER. No man is better able to take care of himself in debate than the Senator from Georgia. He knows that these interruptions are a tribute to him and are not intended to embarrass him at all.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I did not so regard it.

Mr. TELLER. I am not finding fault.

Mr. SPOONER. The question I put to the Senator I would like to have him answer.

Mr. BACON. I will do so with pleasure, if I can.

Mr. SPOONER. That is upon what theory he proposes that a declaration shall be made by this Congress which can in any way bind a subsequent Congress?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Arkansas has answered the question for me, and I repeat that it is exactly in the same way that we made the pledge with reference to Cuba, when it is within the power of this Fifty-sixth Congress to disregard that pledge of the Fifty-fifth Congress and go and take Cuba. But I would not do it.

Mr. ELKINS. But we own the Philippine Islands, and we do not own Cuba. That changes the conditions entirely. We own the Philippines by treaty.

Mr. TELLER. What I have been trying to get at is that the Senator from Georgia criticised the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin and——

Mr. BACON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I said I might vote for it. I did not know——

Mr. TELLER. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we will not confer any extra power upon the President of the United States until peace is established over there by any act of ours, and he has, as the Senator says——

Mr. BACON. This resolution does not confer any power on the President.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator himself said it is a czar's power, a military power, and that is the most absolute power in the world. There is absolutely no restriction upon the President except those great humanitarian ideas that must pervade every ruler.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. That is all.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me; I will wait.

Mr. TELLER. He is the legislative department; he is the judiciary department; he is the executive department of that country. He is given absolute control of it.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator does not want to reply at all——

Mr. BACON. Yes, I do; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word or two on what he put to me when he gets through.

Mr. BACON. I have been through for half an hour, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. What I wish to say is that there is no distinction between the proposition made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that the President shall administer and the proposition the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] made that we shall say he may administer, for he must administer in either case.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in the presentation of this subject I have been subjected to so many interruptions by Senators—interruptions to which I have not objected, but which, on the contrary, I have cheerfully welcomed—that I have omitted to read at the proper places several extracts, and I will insert them at this point.

In an elaborate address made by Professor Schurman, the chairman of the Philippine Commission, since his return from the Philippine Islands, among other propositions he lays down the following:

> The next lesson I draw from the history of colonization is cognate to the first. The government of colonies or dependencies is not a money-making enterprise for the sovereign power or its citizens.

Lord Macaulay says as follows:

> There are some who assert that, from a military and political point of view, the West Indies are of great importance to this country. This is a common but a monstrous misrepresentation. We venture to say that colonial empire has been one of the greatest curses of modern Europe. What nation has it ever strengthened? What nation has it ever enriched? What have been its fruits? Wars of frequent occurrence and immense cost, fettered trade, lavish expenditure, clashing jurisdiction, corruption in governments, and indigence among the people. What have Mexico and Peru done for Spain, the Brazils for Portugal, Batavia for Holland? Or, if the experience of others is lost upon us, shall we not profit by our own? What have we not sacrificed to our infatuated passion for trans-Atlantic dominion? This it is that has so often led us to risk our own smiling gardens and dear firesides for some snowy desert or infectious morass on the other side of the globe; this induced us to resign all the advantages of our insular situation, to embroil ourselves in the intrigues and fight the battles of half the Continent, to form coalitions which were instantly broken, to give subsidies which were never earned: this gave birth to the fratricidal war against American liberty, with all its disgraceful defeats, and all its barren victories, and all the massacres of the Indian hatchet, and all the bloody contracts of the Hessian slaughter-house; this it was which, in the war against the French Republic, induced us to send thousands and tens of thousands of our bravest troops to die in West Indian hospitals, while the armies of our enemies were pouring over the Rhine and the Alps.
> When a colonial acquisition has been in prospect we have thought no expenditure extravagant, no interference perilous. Gold has been to us as dust, and blood as water. Shall we never learn wisdom? Shall we never cease to prosecute a pursuit wilder than the wildest dreams of alchemy, with all the credulity and all the profusion of Sir Epicure Mammon?
> Those who maintain that settlements so remote conduce to the military or maritime power of nations, fly in the face of history.

This testimony could be largely added to. The opinion of this eminent historian and statesman, thus forcibly expressed, is sufficient at least to put the burden on the other side.

I will, however, add that Lord Herschel, the eminent British statesman who was twice lord chancellor, who died in Washington a year ago, in a personal conversation with myself a short time before his death expressed substantially the same views as those above quoted from Lord Macaulay.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the fourth resolution, which I hope and pray—and I have not any doubt about it——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator one question before he proceeds.

Mr. TELLER. Well, I will hear the Senator now, and then proceed later.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not believe that when his amendment was adopted declaring our purpose in regard to Cuba, if an amendment to that had been moved in the Senate which inserted the words "or any other Spanish territory," he would have accepted and supported the amendment, and the entire Senate, substantially, would have voted for it?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I answered that a year ago last December in a speech which I made, when I said I would have accepted it, and I believe every member who voted for the resolutions would have voted for such a declaration if I had included all the possessions of Spain that we might despoil her of; and it is one of the regrets of my life that I did not draw the resolutions broad enough to cover the present case.

Mr. HOAR. That being what I believe also, the Senator, as I understand, then believed that he and the Senate would have renounced any purpose on the part of the people of the United States to exercise permanent dominion over a conquered province or a subject people. If he would have gone for that then, and the Senate would have done so, why will he not go for that now and endeavor to induce the Senate to do so?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have answered the Senator in a speech I made more than a year ago, which, as the Senator from Georgia said a while ago, he had not done me the honor to listen to.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Colorado certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. TELLER. I am using your phrase, when you said that Senators had not listened to you.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I beg pardon; I misunderstood the Senator. I always listen to the Senator from Colorado with pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I understand when a nation assumes that it is about to do an act of humanity, such as we were going to do and which everybody connected with the matter, from the highest to the lowest, declared was to be an act of humanity, and nothing else, that a decent respect for the opinions of mankind required that we should disclaim any attempt to take territory. More than that, Mr. President, I understand there is an obligation—which, of course, there is no court to enforce—upon a nation when it has accomplished the object for which it started out and has attained the end it had in view, that it shall not appropriate the land of the other country. That is, a decent respect for international obligations requires that we should so declare, and then we should adhere to it.

In drafting those resolutions I had in mind two things. I believed the declarations they contained would have a tendency, when we had concluded the work of driving the Spaniards out, to satisfy the people over there that we were not going to put upon them a government like that of Spain, or put upon them a government of any kind of which they did not approve. I believed also those declarations would have a beneficial effect upon the European world, who were contending very generally that we were false in the statement that we were taking that course in the interest of freedom and humanity; that we were really the aggressors; that we had entered upon a policy of aggression and appropriation of lands, the end of which no man could foretell, and that we were practically threatening the peace of mankind.

I say now, as I said before, that I did not put that fourth resolution there as of binding force upon this nation, for I never supposed, having started out with such declarations, that when we had released Cuba we would impose on her people a government objectionable to them. I knew that our proximity to that country was such that we must always maintain close relations with her people. I knew that we should always say to the whole world, "You must keep your hands off Cuba." I had no thought of these western islands. I see no way to pacify these islands except by the sword, although if another way can be shown I shall be glad to see the Government avail itself of it. If we can by diplomacy secure peace and quiet there, I shall be greatly delighted. I do not think it would be beneath the dignity of this great Government to accept propositions of peace from those people.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator one other question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator does he not think that the assurance of that purpose which he entertains, if made now by the Senate of the United States, would tend very strongly to bring about the peace which he desires?

Mr. TELLER. I have some doubts about that. I am not certain that this is the time to do that. The time to have done that was before the war began; but when the war shall have been closed, I think we will stand before the world committed to the idea that we are to give those people self-government. I do not mean by that that we are to stand out and say to them, "Take care of yourselves." I do not believe that would be safe for them or for us; but I believe we should give to them all the self-government which they are capable of exercising.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that the majority of mankind who have risen above a state of actual savagery are capable of self-government. They can not, of course, maintain such a government as the people of my State sustain, nor can they maintain such a government as is sustained by the people of Massachusetts or of New Hampshire. But they can maintain a government good enough for them; for, I repeat, it is a fundamental republican principle that a people are entitled to such a government, and only such a government, as they themselves can maintain. It will not do for somebody else to go there and say, "We will give you a better government than you can establish for yourselves; and therefore we will deny you participation in it, and we will govern you."

I said a year ago that I hoped when peace prevailed in that section of the world we would apply the fourth resolution, in principle, to those people, doing what they wanted us to do and said they desired we should do, keeping, however, international control over them, so that no other nation should repeat what Spain had done toward them for so many years in the way of oppression.

What I complain of in the speech of the Senator from Georgia—and I listened to him with great interest—is that he assumes, when the war is terminated, we propose to do something which is contrary to the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. Then I certainly have misunderstood the Senator. That assumption has been, in my judgment, the vice of all the speeches which have been made here on this subject by those who claim that they are anti-imperialists. They set up a condition which we hope will never exist, and then denounce that condition. I would denounce a proposition to govern those people as proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] and others. It would not meet with my approval; neither do I believe it would meet with the approval of a majority in this body. I am confident it would not meet with the approval of any considerable number of the American people.

I believe when the time comes that peace prevails the American people will be wise enough and just enough to see that the rights of the Filipinos are maintained and that they shall have whatever belongs to them, recognizing the great fundamental republican doctrine that the consent of the governed is essential to the maintenance of any proper government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is recognized.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it suit the Senator from South Carolina to speak to-morrow?

Mr. TILLMAN. I only wish to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] a simple question right in the line of what he was speaking about.

Mr. ALLISON. For reasons apparent to Senators on this side of the Chamber, the Senate should now adjourn, as it should have adjourned at 5 o'clock.

Mr. TILLMAN. You can not take me off the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; I have not yielded.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to take the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator off the floor. I simply state a fact. If Senators upon the other side do not desire to yield to that, of course they can go on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand the object of his request. I simply wished to ask the Senator from Colorado a question directly in the line of the speech he has just made.

Mr. BERRY. I presume the unfinished business, the financial bill, is before the Senate. I want to take the floor on that bill.

Mr. ALLISON. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 31, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege upon which I arise not only affects me, but, it seems to me, affects every member on the floor of this House; and as a basis of the remarks which I desire to make, I send a copy of a letter which I have received from a constituent of mine, and ask that the extract be read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Extract from a letter received from S. A. Thomas, publisher Ortonville Journal.]

ORTONVILLE, MINN., January 25, 1900.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Arthur Taylor, claiming to be a member of subcommittee No. 4 of the committee on distribution, was in our city yesterday, claiming to be distributing 85 sets of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents and asking the sum of $34 per set. He claims that this is the number allotted to your district and four sets to Bigstone County. I ordered a set from him before finding out what he was doing. He went to other parties here, claiming to be sent to them by you and other prominent people, to try and induce them to subscribe for the work, and on being asked whom the money went to and for what purpose he seemed very ignorant, claiming to me that it was for the Republican campaign fund, and to another that it went to the general committee on distribution.

Hoping that this information will be of benefit to you, I am,

Yours, very truly,

S. A. THOMAS.

Hon. FRANK M. EDDY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. EDDY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not only received this letter from this publisher of the Journal, at Ortonville, Minn., but I have received letters of similar purport from other parts of my district and my State. It seems that this man Taylor, whoever he may be, is going about throughout the country stating to the people that he is acting as a representative of members of Congress in distributing these documents. When he meets a good Republican, he informs him that the money so received goes to the Republican campaign committee—sometimes it is to the national campaign committee, and sometimes to the Congressional campaign committee. When he meets a good Democrat, he informs him that this money goes to the Democratic campaign committee; and when he meets a Mugwump, he represents that he is an agent of the Government and the money goes to the distributing committee. [Laughter.]

Not only this, Mr. Speaker, but my district has been, and I presume other parts of the country have been, flooded with letters that are under a letter head with an elaborate picture of the Capitol of the nation, calling attention to the fact that these messages and documents are for sale, and these letters are signed by a party claiming to be the secretary of the "Distributing Committee," thus conveying the idea that the Government is back of this publication or in some way the publication and sale thereof are in the interest of the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to brand this practice as a fraud. I do not believe that this man or any other man, in the sale of these messages and documents, represents any member on the floor of this House in an official capacity. I know that he does not represent the national Republican committee or the Republican Congressional campaign committee; and I do not believe that he represents the Democratic campaign committee; and all such representations are fraudulent, pure and simple.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I should say a word in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, and I would not do so were it not that the publication to which he refers, and which evidently the man Taylor is selling, is Messages and Papers of the Presidents. This is a work which it is well known I compiled and edited and which Congress ordered published, and which is now being sold by subscription throughout the nation. I know nothing about the canvassing agent to whom he refers. I have nothing to do with the sale of Messages and Papers, except that Congress voted to me a duplicate set of the electrotype plates from which the work is printed, of course with the understanding that these plates could be used by any publisher to whom I might lease them, or rent them, in reproducing that work and selling it. I made a contract with a reliable and responsible firm in New York, James S. Barcus Company, known, I am sure, to many members of the House, and that firm is selling the work. Mr. Barcus is a man of high character and is now a citizen of Terre Haute, Ind., having recently removed to that point from New York.

Now, if the solicitor, Taylor, to whom the gentleman from Minnesota refers, is practicing the fraud which the letter indicates, he ought to be branded as the gentleman from Minnesota has branded him, as a fake and a fraud.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me an interruption?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman know that the concern now publishing this work is using a letter head on which the words "House of Representatives" and "Committee on Distribution" are printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I think the gentleman will find that he is mistaken in saying that the concern uses the words "House of Representatives;" they used Committee on Distribution.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have received letters with that heading printed on them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be another fraud that ought to be branded as such, because they have no right to do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the general manner, and, I think, the wording of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be a fraudulent device which ought to be branded, and which, in my opinion, is without any authority from the publisher selling the work. It may be some agent for the work has taken the liberty of printing them upon a letter head, but it would not be authorized, in my judgment, by the publisher.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would also state that Mr. Spofford's name is printed on the letter head as secretary of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Spofford has been employed to assist, in an honorable way, in the sale of the work. I know that the firm would not authorize a thing of the kind referred to by either of the gentlemen from Minnesota, for I believe they are responsible, and would not pursue improper methods. But where the canvassing or selling agents have done anything like that stated by the gentleman I think they ought to be disciplined, and would be when the firm's attention is called to it. That is about all I can say, Mr. Speaker. I should add that my connection with the matter grows out of the fact that the publishers pay me a small royalty on the sale of the Messages and Papers, but with the methods they pursue I have nothing to do. I have nothing to do with the sale of the work except as I have indicated.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I disclaim any intention of reflecting on the gentleman from Tennessee in any manner. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that there are men traveling through the country and parties circulating letters, advertising these Messages and Papers, upon which there is a picture of the National Capitol and which is signed by a party claiming to be the secretary of the "Distributing Committee;" that these agents are representing that they have been sent abroad throughout the country by members of Congress, and that they are sent out to select the prominent men to purchase these publications, giving the impression that the Government is back of the distribution and sale, and also carrying the impression that either the Republican Congressional committee or the Democratic committee or the Government is receiving the benefits therefrom. That is what I desire to denounce as fraudulent.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, 1897-1899, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 3. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 255. An act to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation in Idaho, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 21:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, 1897-1899, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2179. An act relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

PAY OF RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE MARINE CORPS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up joint resolution No. 77, to provide for pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps, and ask that the bill and report be read, and also ask its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the aggregate of all sums appropriated in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, under the head "Pay, Marine Corps," shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund; the provisions of this act to take effect from June 30, 1899.

The report (by Mr. BUTLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) providing for the payment of certain officers of the Marine Corps who have been without pay since going upon the retired list, beg leave to submit the following report:

The Secretary of the Navy, urging the speedy consideration and passage of this resolution, submitted the following:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1899.

SIR: In the act making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899, provision under "Pay, Marine Corps," was made for the officers then upon the retired list, and a sum sufficient to meet their retired pay was specifically appropriated therefor. No provision was, however, made for the payment of those who subsequently to the passage of the act were placed upon the retired list. It has heretofore been the practice to embody in appropriation bills a clause providing that the moneys therein specifically appropriated for the pay of the Marine Corps should be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose constitute one fund; but this provision was inadvertently omitted from the above act.

Since this act took effect the accounting officers of the Treasury have held that the appropriations made specifically for a given number of officers upon the active and upon the retired list could not be utilized for the payment of a greater number than that in the act mentioned. A number of officers have, since June 30, 1899, been placed upon the retired list, and, in consequence of the action of the Treasury officials, it has been impossible for them to draw any portion of their pay.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

In view of the fact that the resolution is simply to provide authority to pay officers lawfully upon the retired list, as explained by the Secretary of the Navy, who have been for some time deprived of their pay for the reasons stated, your committee recommend that said joint resolution do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how this differs from an ordinary deficiency appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER. As the gentleman will find in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, in preparing the estimates of last year for the maintenance of the Navy, it was anticipated, as is usual, that some officers would go on the retired list after the bill should become a law, and therefore, as is customary, a larger sum of money was appropriated than was actually necessary to pay the officers then on the retired list. Since this law went into effect three or four officers have been retired.

In this case the money has already been appropriated, but by reason of the omission of certain language ordinarily found in the appropriation bill the Treasury Department has declined to pay these officers. In a full meeting of the committee it was unanimously decided that it was but just that these men whose names had been inadvertently omitted from the list should receive their money; and for this purpose this bill has been introduced, and its passage recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and by the full Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. I understand; still this is a matter which would ordinarily be carried in the deficiency estimates for the current year.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman that the money has already been appropriated; there is no deficiency. This legislation is simply necessary in order that these men may be enabled to get their pay. The money is in the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I understand the case perfectly; but this is proposed legislative action to pay some persons that which is alleged to be due them for the current fiscal year.

Mr. BUTLER. For the last year and for the year ending June, 1900.

Mr. CANNON. Then this is for the last year?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; and it is proposed to pay them for the present year.

Mr. CANNON. I have said for the current year.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not very well hear the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly, this money has been already appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER. It has been.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then why is it not available under that appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER. It has been held by the Treasury officials since the passage of the last appropriation bill that by reason of the omission of certain language from the bill they are not warranted in paying these officers who have been placed on the retired list since the passage of that measure. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy:

It has heretofore been the practice to embody in appropriation bills a clause providing that the moneys specifically therein appropriated for the pay of the Marine Corps should be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose constitute one fund, but this provision was inadvertently omitted from the above act.

Now, the Treasury officials have held that because of the omission of those words there is no authority to pay the officers who were not designated. The other officers are all designated.

I may say for the benefit of the gentleman, if he did not hear what I have already said, that, as I am informed, this is the first bill in which this language has been omitted. I may say, further, that the Committee on Naval Affairs took the trouble to make a careful examination of the facts, and after doing so felt warranted in asking the House to pass this bill, so that these three or four men may get their money the same as other men who were so fortunate as to have their names designated in the act.

Mr. CANNON. From the gentleman's explanation I apprehend that an appropriation ought to be made for the pay of these officers who are on the retired list for the current fiscal year. But this is an item belonging in the general deficiency bill; and if the rules are to be observed and we are to have the means of knowing what the deficiencies are for the current year, it seems to me these matters ought not to be split up in this way—one item reported and passed from one committee, and another item from another, and so on. If the facts are as the gentleman states, there will be no trouble, under the rules of the House, in obtaining proper consideration of this item in the general deficiency bill. Therefore I object.

MONUMENT TO SAMUEL HAHNEMANN.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, there has just come from the Senate a joint resolution granting permission to erect in one of our public parks a statue to Samuel Hahnemann. A similar resolution has been favorably reported from the Committee on the Library of this House. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 3) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That permission be, and the same is hereby, granted the Hahnemann monument committee of the American Institute of Homeopathy to erect a monument in honor of Samuel Hahnemann in such place in the city of Washington, D. C., other than the Capitol or Library grounds, as shall be designated by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the monument committee; and the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the building of a foundation upon which to place said monument; said monument to be presented to the people of the United States by the American Institute of Homeopathy, kindred associations, and citizens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let us hear some explanation of it.

Mr. DALZELL. I will state that a resolution similar in form to this passed the Fifty-fourth Congress, but reached the President too late for his signature. It passed the Senate in the last Congress, but failed in the House. It has been recommended by the Committee on the Library. It is a simple proposition to give to the city of Washington or to the United States Government what has been pronounced to be a very superb work of art, produced at a cost of $75,000, the money having been contributed by people from all the States of the Union. It seems to me only proper that we should seize the opportunity to accept a gift of such value. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. COWHERD. It was observed, I believe, in a discussion heretofore upon the unveiling of a statue in one of our public parks that those parks should be reserved for statues of men who have been distinguished in some branch of the public service. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether that has not been the practice heretofore?

Mr. DALZELL. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri that it is not. There are now in the Smithsonian grounds, as gentlemen well know, a statue erected to Dr. Gross and also a statue erected to Professor Henry. And the gentleman will see around the magnificent Congressional Library busts of distinguished men of all professions who have claimed distinction and earned fame in the eyes of the world.

Mr. COWHERD. That is devoted exclusively to such subjects. It seems to me, while I do not desire to make any objection in the present case, that we are establishing a very bad precedent and a practice that will be uncomfortable in the future. We will open the door, in other words, for every little society throughout the land who desires to perpetuate the name of some member to come here and have a statue erected in his honor.

Mr. McCLEARY. What objection can there be in the present instance?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not intend to raise an objection; I am simply calling attention to a bad precedent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was considered, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF INDIAN BILL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the Indian appropriation bill and that the number to be printed be limited to 500. I am informed that there are only about 50 copies of the bill left, and there is quite a demand for them. Inasmuch as the bill will come up to-morrow, there ought to be a number at hand for the convenience of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There being no objection, the order to reprint was made to the extent of 500 copies.

NAVAL OPERATIONS, PHILIPPINES.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the call of committees is now the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present at this time a privileged report from the Committee on Insular Affairs and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to inform the House of Representatives of the amount of money expended and the amount for which the Government is liable remaining unpaid for equipments, transportation, supplies, and naval operations in the Philippine Islands from May 1, 1898, up to and including January 1, 1900."

The Committee on Insular Affairs, to whom was referred House Resolution No. 91, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for certain information therein mentioned, beg leave to report that they have had the said resolution under consideration and recommend that it do pass with the following amendments, to wit:

Strike out the word "requested," in line 1, and the words "if not incompatible with the public service," in line 2, and in lieu thereof insert the word "directed;" and further amend by inserting after the word "amount," in line 4, the words "so far as he is able to state the same;" and by striking out the word "January," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "November;" and by striking out the words "nineteen hundred," in line 8, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "eighteen hundred and ninety-nine;" so that the said resolution shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to inform the House of Representatives of the amount of money expended and the amount, so far as he is able to state the same, for which the Government is liable, remaining unpaid, for equipment, transportation, supplies, and naval operations in the Philippine Islands from May 1, 1898, up to and including November 1, 1899."

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and the amendments agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MILITARY OPERATIONS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire also, Mr. Speaker, to present a second privileged report from the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to inform the House of Representatives of the amount of money expended and the amount for which the Government is liable, remaining unpaid, for equipment, transportation, supplies, and military operations in the Philippine Islands from May 1, 1898, up to and including January 1, 1900."

The Committee on Insular Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 92, calling on the Secretary of War for certain information therein mentioned, beg leave to report that they have had said resolution under consideration, and recommend that it do pass with the following amendments, to wit:

Strike out the words "requested, if not," in line 1, and the words "incompatible with the public service," in line 2, and in lieu thereof insert the word "directed;" and further amend by inserting after the word "amount," in line 4, the words "so far as he is able to state the same;" strike out the word "January," in line 7, and in lieu thereof insert the word "November;" strike out the words "nineteen hundred," in line 8, and in lieu thereof insert the words "eighteen hundred and ninety-nine;" so that as amended said resolution shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to inform the House of Representatives of the amount of money expended and the amount, so far as he is able to state the same, for which the Government is liable, remaining unpaid, for equipment, transportation, supplies, and military operations in the Philippine Islands from May 1, 1898, up to and including November 1, 1899."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that these resolutions, as well as the amendments to them, were unanimously agreed to by the Committee on Insular Affairs. There was no objection in the committee. The resolutions were introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER]. I make this statement for the benefit of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who desired that information.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] calls for the regular order. The Clerk will call the committees in the morning hour.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

MILITARY POST AT DES MOINES, IOWA.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a bill on the House Calendar, and the report accompanying it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, calls up a bill for consideration. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 99) to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa.

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the transfer and conveyance to the United States of a good and sufficient title to not less than 400 acres of land, without cost to the United States, situated at or near the city of Des Moines, in the county of Polk and State of Iowa, and on or near a railroad, and constituting an eligible and suitable site for an army post, and to be approved and accepted by the Secretary of War for that purpose, then and thereupon there shall be, and is hereby, established and located on said land a United States army post, of such character and capacity as the Secretary of War shall direct and approve.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL. I was simply going to say that this bill has been reported three times by the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to make a point of order. As I caught the reading of this bill, it ought to be on the Union Calendar, and not considered in the House in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] makes the point of order that this bill should be upon the Union Calendar.

Mr. HULL. I should like to make a little statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand from the reading of the bill that it makes a charge upon the Treasury and an appropriation of money, and therefore ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the bill only authorizes the Secretary of War to accept a donation of land, and the small charge, if any, upon the Government would depend upon his exercising the discretion in favor of accepting this donation.

Mr. GAINES. Does not the bill expressly provide for the erection of a military post after this land is purchased?

Mr. HULL. Not at all, unless the Secretary of War accepts the land, and that is left with him to determine.

Mr. GAINES. If he accepted it a military post would be established?

Mr. HULL. Certainly would be established.

Mr. GAINES. That involves an expenditure of money.

Mr. HULL. Conditional upon his acceptance of the land.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Iowa to state what constitutes the locating of a post.

Mr. HULL. If the Secretary of War shall accept the donation of land offered for this purpose it would establish the post. If he declined to accept that land, and held it unsuitable, it would not establish a post.

The SPEAKER. Does the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs hold that there is no expense connected with the locating of the post?

Mr. HULL. There is none at all connected with the location; absolutely none. The whole expense would be in case the Secretary accepted the donation of land.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to read the rule upon the subject, which is to be found on page 296 of the Manual. The rule says there shall be—

First, a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character directly or indirectly appropriating money or property.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds some embarrassment in deciding the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia. An examination of the bill shows that a donation of land is made to the Government. It also contains another element, namely, the establishment and location of a United States Army post by the Secretary of War at Des Moines, Iowa.

There is no appropriation contained in the bill, and no burden is directly laid upon the Treasury. It is so framed that it establishes a post, and there is nothing to show that there is any cost attending it. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL] says that there is none; and while it is manifest to the Chair and to all present that this means opening the door to possible future burdens, non constat, however, that Congress will ever appropriate a dollar for that purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. May I make a suggestion right there?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose a bill authorizing acceptance of some land in the city of Des Moines for the purposes of a public building——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, let us have a little better order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to suggest very respectfully that this Hall is not made for receptions, but for the public business; and if there is but one man present who desires to transact the public business, his rights are sacred in this Hall. The Chair has been endeavoring all the morning to have conversation suspended so that intelligent work can be done; and the Chair again appeals to the House to observe the respect due each member by foregoing conversation. There is ample provision for discussion and consultation, much needed all the time, elsewhere; but members are in this Hall for work; and the Chair again appeals to the House to aid in what is essentially a proper discharge of the duty of each member. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I was supposing this case: That a bill was brought in here for the acceptance of a plat of land in Des Moines, or any other place, for the purposes of a public building in that place. Now, the mere language of that bill perhaps might not directly involve an appropriation, but if Congress ever carries out the object of that bill, of course it involves an appropriation. It involves it indirectly, it pledges the faith of the Government for the erection of a public building. Of course we all know that it will be followed and would necessarily be followed by an appropriation in order to build the public building upon that land.

Now, it seems to me that this is a similar case. If we accept the land for the purpose of establishing a military post, or for a military post, no matter how the language of the bill may be or what the wording may be, it indirectly involves an appropriation, and comes then within the rule. It seems to me it would be dangerous to lay down the bars in that way; if any language could be invoked that would bring it under the House Calendar, when the necessary result would be to call for an appropriation to build the building on the land and eventually an appropriation from the Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I insist that this bill, if passed, or we should enter upon the consideration of it, must indirectly eventuate in having a charge laid upon the Government indirectly.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to me it almost would be directly, because the Secretary of War has to investigate, to examine, and see whether he will accept it or not, which can not be done without expense. It seems to me that it directly involves, but certainly indirectly involves, a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I call attention to another fact?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Secretary of War has in his hands a fund appropriated by Congress already for the establishment of and carrying on of these military posts, as I understand it. If I am wrong, I will be corrected; but I so understand it. If this bill should become law and he should accept the land, he would be authorized under existing law, out of money already appropriated and at the disposal of the Department, to go on and establish the post, erect the buildings, and do whatever was necessary to carry out the true intent and purpose of the bill. So that it would carry expense and money belonging to the United States without any further action on the part of Congress. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HULL. You are correct in that.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from Iowa says I am correct in that statement.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, there is no question as to the state of facts. I want to say that this was placed on the House Calendar in the ordinary transaction of business. I had no power to assign the bill to any calendar. The bill was drawn with the distinct understanding, when reported by the committee, differing from the way it had been reported heretofore, not binding the Government absolutely to establish the post there, but providing that if this land is accepted by the Secretary of War it then establishes the post. The bill was reported in the last two Congresses establishing a post and making an appropriation for the commencement of the building. This leaves it all in the discretion of the Secretary of War. I hope the point will not be insisted upon.

I want to say to the House that I simply call it up by action of the committee, because it was on the House Calendar, placed there by the proper authority. It makes no appropriation and involves no expense, unless the Secretary of War accepts this land, and if he does accept the land, why then it does establish the post; and he can apportion a part of the money appropriated by the Congress of the United States for the building; but he has absolute discretion to refuse to accept the land under certain conditions.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will ask if it is not always the invariable rule where an executive officer is invested with discretion as to whether he will do something which involves an expenditure of money, that the very fact that you vest that discretion in an executive officer leads him to the conclusion that it is the wish of Congress that he should do that which has been vested in his discretion?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman can answer that just as well as I can. That does not require any special answer from me.

Mr. BROMWELL. I understand that; but I want to call attention to the fact that when discretion is vested in an executive officer it is always considered by him authority to go ahead and do that over which discretionary power has been given.

Mr. HULL. I do not know that that necessarily follows. If this bill passes, the Secretary of War will accept the land. I would not have any object in passing it if I did not believe he would accept the land and establish this post.

Mr. BROSIUS. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether he thinks we ought to accept it?

Mr. HULL. Yes; I do.

Mr. BROSIUS. Is a military post needed there?

Mr. HULL. If the bill comes before the House, I will give the reasons for it, if necessary. In my judgment, a post should be established there.

Mr. BROSIUS. That is the very first question that the House should inquire into.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair remarked, this is a very doubtful question and one that embarrasses the Chair not a little. All will understand that it is the more embarrassing as it relates to the State in which the Speaker lives; but that particular the Chair must eliminate from the consideration of the question.

Mr. HULL. Will the Chair permit me an interruption?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. Will the Chair permit me now to ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to have unanimous consent asked.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will make that request, and with it concede that it has been improperly put on the House Calendar.

Mr. HULL. I do not think I ought to concede that, because, as the Chair says, it is a doubtful question, and one I am not charged with determining. I would not consent to assume that it is improperly on the House Calendar, but I will make a request for unanimous consent, and it can be further investigated if it ever comes up again, leaving the question of reference to be determined when necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to decide it, but will be glad to submit the request of the gentleman from Iowa, who asks unanimous consent that House bill 99 be considered in the House under its present form as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object, but I desire to call the attention of the Chair to two things in connection with the situation. First, there is a point of order pending now against the bill being considered.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent would be a withdrawal of the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I want to go one step further. Ever since this rule has been in force in this House the occupant of the chair has steadily maintained that business of this character could not come up in this hour; that is, he has held that this hour was devoted to a particular character of business. While the point of order may never have been raised on that, while it may not be quoted in the decisions, I think it is within the memory of every member of this House that the Speaker of the last Congress, and ever since these rules have been in force Speakers have steadily maintained that business of that character should not come before the House under any form. I only desire to offer that suggestion to the Chair because that has been the practice, Mr. Speaker, and I think that it will open an avenue that will ultimately trouble the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say in reply to the gentleman from California that unanimous consent, of course, cuts the Gordian knot in all these matters, and that the very rule under which we are now proceeding does provide a manner in which, after an hour's discussion, any bill in Committee of the Whole on the Union Calendar can be reached, as was done on yesterday. The Chair therefore submits the question again. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. HULL), as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 99) to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa, having had the same under consideration, report said bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee adopt the report made to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

[House Report No. 287, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5988) to establish a military post at Des Moines, Iowa, report the same back with recommendation that said bill do pass.

The committee adopt the report made to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs in the Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, and also submit the recommendations of the War Department, submitted on the 25th of January, 1896.

[House Report No. 655, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1703) entitled "A bill to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass:

The policy of the Government is to abandon the smaller posts on what has been known as the frontier and concentrate troops near large centers of population and railroad centers. This policy will be continued as the Indians are grouped on reservations and the necessity for small detachments of troops to protect settlers disappears. Des Moines is the capital of Iowa, a city of 60,000 people, and one of the great railroad centers of the West. It has ten railroads, which, with their branches, reach every part of the State and could be used to transport troops to any point on either the Mississippi or Missouri River to protect the great bridges across those streams.

Des Moines is situated in the heart of the richest agricultural region in the United States, and troops can be maintained there at a minimum of cost. The climate is most healthful, and troops can be maintained at highest efficiency.

From Des Moines troops could be thrown into any of the great cities of the middle West in a few hours and at small expense.

The land given is of great value. The building up of great central posts requires time, and long before the completion of barracks at Des Moines many other posts now used will be abandoned, and your committee recommend the acceptance of the donation of land and commencement of the work at Des Moines.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith House bill 5988, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled "A bill to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa," which was referred by your committee, under date of January 15 instant, to this Department for information and remark.

It has been the policy of the Department for some years, as the Indians have ceased to be a disturbing element in the settlement of the Territories, and thus permitted the abandonment of the many small posts that until recently were scattered along the frontier, to concentrate the troops thus released near the large centers of population, where many railway lines converge and allow of their being rapidly transported to points of threatened disturbance. The large modern posts of Fort Sheridan, near Chicago; Fort Thomas, opposite Cincinnati; Fort Logan, near Denver, and Fort Crook, near Omaha, are examples of this policy.

Des Moines, the capital of Iowa, a city of some 70,000 people, is situated in the heart of a rich agricultural region; has ten railroads, three of them trunk lines, reaching to every point of Iowa and its adjoining States; is about midway between St. Paul, Minneapolis, and St. Louis, and but ten hours from Chicago. The region is healthy and affords abundant food supplies such as are necessary to maintain a military post. The bill before me proposes that the citizens of Des Moines shall donate the land requisite for the purpose, and the question of the capacity and character of the post is left to the determination of the Secretary of War.

[Some considerable time would necessarily be consumed in securing and conveying the land, in preparing it for building, and in construction of the post, and in the meantime the troops requisite for its garrison would likely be available.

In this view of the subject, and in harmony with its policy above outlined, the Department would view with favor the passage of the bill.

Very respectfully,

G. D. MEIKLEJOHN,
Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. J. A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXPERIMENTAL AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the bill H. R. 1092, with the report thereon.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], who made the report on the bill, that it is desirable to change it in some respects, and I ask permission of the House to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks permission to withdraw the bill H. R. 1092. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDING SECTION 4843, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the bill (H. R. 5491) to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes, with the accompanying report.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs calls up the bill H. R. 5491, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4843 of the Revised Statutes be amended by inserting the word "Pay" in line 8, after the word "Qartermaster's;" so that the paragraph will read: "Second. Civilians employed in the Quartermaster's, Pay, and Subsistence Departments of the Army who may be, or may hereafter become, insane while in such employment."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the bill read. Will the gentleman from Iowa state the substance of it?

Mr. HULL. When this section referred to in the statute became a law there were no civilians employed in the Pay Department of the Army. Persons belonging in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps could, if they became insane, be sent to the Government hospital at Anacostia, but if civilian employees become insane they can not be treated at the Government hospital unless authorized by law. One in the Pay Corps is already insane, who has worked a great many years for the Government, and they are anxious to send him to the hospital for treatment, but he can not be received under the law as it now stands. In the Quartermaster and Commissary corps the law authorized the admission of civilian employees. This law simply puts in the word "Pay" so that it puts the three bureaus on an equal footing as to the treatment of insane persons.

The bill was then passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCLINE RAILWAY, WEST MOUNTAIN, HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. LACEY (when the Committee on the Public Lands was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 2956) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of an incline railway upon the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, as provided by act of Congress approved December 21, 1893, is hereby extended for the term of five years from and after the passage of this act, and that said act is hereby continued in full force and effect.

The amendment reported by the committee to strike out "five" and insert "three," so as to read "for the term of three years from and after the passage of this act," was read.

Mr. LACEY. This grant has heretofore been made, but there has been delay in building the railway. This bill proposes only to grant three years' additional time to complete the road. It is simply an easement in the reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CORLISS (when the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress was called). I ask unanimous consent that this committee may be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

The call of committees was resumed and concluded, no further reports being called up.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the inner harbor of San Pedro, Cal.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved, if there be no objection.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, stating that on February 23, 1899, there was transmitted from the Interior Department a copy of the agreement between the United States commissioners to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commissioners on the part of the Creek (or Muscogee) Nation, concluded at Muscogee, Ind. T., February 1, 1899, for such action as Congress might deem proper in the premises, and requesting that, in accordance with the desire of the chairman of the commission and the principal chief of the Creek Nation, the agreement be returned to the Department for further consideration and such modification as may be deemed necessary and proper. The communication was sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and this request that it be returned should go to the same committee.

Mr. HALE. Returned by whom?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now in the possession of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it is the request of the Secretary of the Interior that it be returned in order that some amendments may be made to it.

Mr. HALE. Why not refer it to the same committee and then let them report as to returning it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is proposed as the proper course. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1899; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 23, 24, 25, 31, and 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 49, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"Public building at Helena, Mont.: The limit of cost of site for public building at Helena, Mont., is hereby fixed at $33,502.35, in lieu of the sum named in the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 4, 1897, but the aggregate cost of the site and building shall not be increased."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 5 and 26 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. There are two items left open, not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire that it shall go back into conference?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments still in disagreement and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 99) to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. 2956) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation; and

A bill (H. R. 5491) to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 3) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to present a petition of the Farmers' National Congress, in the form of a resolution that was adopted at the nineteenth annual session of that Congress, held at Boston October 3 to 10, 1899. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the interests of the whole country, the reenforcement of our Navy, the enlargement of foreign markets for our surplus products, the increased employment of our workingmen in the mine, foundry, factory, and shipyard, and the training of able seamen would all be promoted by the restoration of our merchant marine to its former position on the seas of the world: Therefore,

Resolved, That in our opinion it is the duty of Congress, at the earliest day possible, to enact legislation to secure such restoration by the extension of such aid to American-built mail carriers and freighters as will enable them to successfully compete with the subsidized and bountied merchant ships of foreign countries in the carrying of our imports and exports.

I move that this petition in the form of a resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) submitted an amendment directing the payment of $216,679.48 to the members of the Chickasaw Indian tribes out of money heretofore appropriated and belonging to what is known as the "incompetent fund," intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $15,000 for paving Fourteenth street to Lydecker avenue, and Lydecker avenue to east side of Thirteenth street, intended to be proposed by him to the District appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RULES ADOPTED BY COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the code of rules adopted by the Committee on Pensions be printed in the RECORD. The rules are brief, they will not occupy much space, and will give information to a class of people outside of the two Houses of Congress which may prevent to some extent the flood of private pension bills that are coming to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the code of rules adopted by the Committee on Pensions touching pension claims be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The code of rules referred to is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS, UNITED STATES SENATE.

Rules adopted by the committee December 13, 1898. Revised January 9, 1900.

1. No bill will be considered by this committee unless application for pension or increase of pension has first been made to the Bureau of Pensions, nor while the claim is pending in the Bureau, except in cases where conclusive proof is presented that the claimant has no pensionable status under existing laws. Claims passed upon by the Bureau, whether allowed or rejected, will not be given consideration until a period of at least one year has elapsed: Provided, however, That in case of persons over 70 years of age, or claims which have been rejected because they do not technically come within the provisions of existing law, the requirement as to time may be waived.

2. Where original pension or increase of pension has been allowed by special act, no proposition for additional pension will be entertained.

3. In no case will the allowance of arrears be recommended in a special pension bill.

4. Bills proposing to pension sons or daughters of soldiers will not be entertained except in cases where the beneficiary has been idiotic, deformed, or otherwise mentally or physically incapacitated from birth or early childhood, and then only in cases of destitution. In such cases the rate allowed shall not exceed $12 per month.

5. Bills for increasing pensions which have been granted by the Bureau at the maximum rate under the act of June 27, 1890, will not be given consideration except in cases of actual destitution or extreme physical disability: Provided, however, That where pension has been allowed under the act of June 27, 1890, and a rejected claim exists under the general law, the equities in the latter claim may be considered in connection with the bill.

6. Where pension has been allowed at the rate of $8 per month under the law of 1887, granting service pensions to soldiers and widows of soldiers of the Mexican war, no proposition for increase will be entertained until after application has been made to the Pension Bureau and action taken thereon under the amended Mexican pension law granting $12 per month to such as are wholly disabled for manual labor and in destitute circumstances: Provided, however, That if application for increase has been pending in the Bureau for the period of one year the provisions of this rule may be waived.

7. Bills proposing to pension men who were not mustered into the military service, except in cases where in emergencies they performed military duty and were wounded, or unless some special or extraordinary service was rendered in connection with the Army, are not admissible.

8. No widow's pension will be recommended in excess of the maximum rate allowed by law except in cases of destitution or extreme physical disability, to be substantiated by sworn testimony, including the claimant's affidavit; and in no case will pension be recommended for a widow at a higher rate than $50 per month.

9. Consideration will not be given to any bill which proposes to restore to the roll the name of a widow whose pension was forfeited by remarriage unless she was the wife of the soldier during the period of his military service, and is now a widow in actual need.

10. Bills proposing to pension brothers or sisters of soldiers are not admissible.

11. Bills for original pension will ordinarily be considered by this committee in preference to those for increase.

12. Upon request of a Senator any bill will be promptly referred to a subcommittee, but the bill must be reported back to the full committee for consideration and action.

13. An authorized statement by a member of the committee, or by the Senator introducing a bill, as to the circumstances of the claimant, will be required when satisfactory evidence does not appear among the papers accompanying the bill.

JACOB H. GALLINGER, Chairman.

JOHN H. WALKER, Clerk.

STENOGRAPHER FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings held and to be held by the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the bill (S. 1439) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

TRANSACTIONS WITH NEW YORK CITY BANKS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolutions of inquiry dated January 4 and 23, 1900, concerning certain transactions between the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I object.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

MARY J. MORROW.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary J. Morrow, widow of Christopher C. Morrow, deceased, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to twelve months' salary at the rate paid to the said clerk per annum, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2956) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 99) to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa; and

A bill (H. R. 5491) to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes.

HISTORY OF FILIPINO REVOLT.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the Authentic Review of the Philippine Revolution, which is as follows——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if that is the article or the pamphlet which he asked to have printed yesterday?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose the reading of the resolution will develop what the Senator wishes to ascertain.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is a motion now pending to print that article, which I take to be the same, and before it makes a part of the RECORD—before it is printed as a public document—I wish to enter my protest against its being printed as a part of the RECORD and becoming a document of the United States in any form.

I have never made any protest against printing that has been ordered here, of all sorts of articles and speeches on all kinds of subjects, although I think that it is a privilege which is greatly abused; but in this case I do desire to enter a protest, and the reason why I do so is because, in this publication or pamphlet, a number of statements are attributed to Admiral Dewey which I have his authority to say are absolutely false.

Mr. President, that the Anti-Imperialist League and its one newspaper organ should print and circulate anything of any sort without regard to its character is to be expected. It is their trade, and I have nothing to say against it. They are such careful guardians of other people's virtue that they can do things which persons of less virtue than themselves would shrink from performing. But I do think that for the United States to send out under its imprint a series of statements attributing remarks and conversation to the Admiral of its Navy which he states to be absolutely false is something in which the Senate should not engage.

I will read the statement of Admiral Dewey, in a note I received from him this morning:

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: The statement of Emilio Aguinaldo, as recently published in the Springfield Republican, so far as it relates to me, is a tissue of falsehoods.

* * * * * * *

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

Now, I do not think that on that statement we ought in any way to put a pamphlet containing that tissue of falsehoods into the RECORD or print it as a public document. It does not seem to me that it is the proper thing to do. The document would go out and be circulated under a frank, free of cost; no denial could go with it of those lies which have been denounced by the Admiral of the Navy as such, which are attributed directly to him and which, in the pamphlet I saw, were all printed in italics. The pamphlet I read purported to be written by Aguinaldo, and to have been printed, I believe, at Tarlac, in Luzon.

It seems to me to bear the marks of publication and preparation at some place nearer the United States than Luzon or Hongkong. But be that as it may, all these emphasized statements of conversations which, on their face, were reported eighteen months after they were supposed to have taken place, are stigmatized by the Admiral himself as a "tissue of falsehoods." I do not think it is just to him; I do not think it is proper for the United States to allow such statements as that to go out under its imprint and in its official record, and that is why I enter my protest at this point.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I raise the question of order upon the consideration of the resolution. It seems to me that to put a resolution in this form is a clear and palpable evasion of the Senate rules. As I understand, the Senator from South Dakota undertakes by this method to have inserted in the RECORD a long paper which he asked the Senate yesterday to have printed and which he has a resolution before the Senate to have printed. That resolution, under the rules, must go to the Committee on Printing. The Senator will succeed in this form, if he is allowed, to have this paper printed, which a large proportion of Senators certainly have made strenuous objections to having printed, and he will succeed in having it printed in the RECORD by what seems to me to be a clear evasion of the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. That it is out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it is out of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, this paper is a translation from a Spanish pamphlet written by Aguinaldo and translated in Boston. It was furnished to the Springfield Republican, and they sent it to their reporter in this city, requesting him to call the attention of Admiral Dewey to the allusions to himself in the document. The reporter did so, and Admiral Dewey, after examining it, replied through his secretary that he would say nothing; that he would adhere to his decision and say nothing upon the subject until the commission made its report.

It now appears that Admiral Dewey has concluded to say something upon the subject, and a letter turns up in the hands of the Senator from Massachusetts in which he says that the statements with regard to himself are a tissue of falsehoods. Now, a statement of that sort could be made simply if Mr. Dewey and Mr. Aguinaldo, in a very immaterial way, almost, misunderstood each other, one construction being put upon the language by one, they not speaking a common tongue, and another construction by the other upon the language used between them. That there was a recognition of Aguinaldo and his government by us and by our Navy there can be no possible question. Admiral Dewey recognized the flag of the Philippine republic and the vessels of that republic in Manila Bay.

Mr. SPOONER. How?

Mr. PETTIGREW. By saluting the flag and by convoying one of the vessels of the Filipino republic to Subig Bay and receiving the surrender of Spanish garrisons, and then turning the prisoners over to Aguinaldo after their surrender.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator's permission at that point——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will not yield. The Senator can speak when I am through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I will read the rest of the letter subsequently.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, what is more, Mr. President, after Manila surrendered, while we were negotiating a treaty of peace with Spain, Admiral Dewey captured and confiscated these vessels belonging to Aguinaldo's government and took the flag of that republic from off the sea, a direct act of war against our allies, who to the number of 30,000 were camped around the town of Manila, who had helped capture Manila, who entered Manila with our forces and took possession of a large portion of the suburbs of that city, and who retired after entering Manila with our forces from the inner city and the larger part of the city, which is outside of the old city of Manila.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. If this debate is to be engaged in some of the rest of us will want a little time, and I think some agreement ought to be made about it. I take it the Senator from South Dakota is proceeding out of order in discussing the question that has been ruled upon by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I have no objection to his going on if it be understood that it is an open debate; but I should be unwilling that the Senator from South Dakota, who has occupied the attention of the Senate for hours and hours in defense of this distinguished citizen of the Philippines, should be permitted to make a lengthy speech and then the rest of us should be shut off from answering. That is the only point I wish to make.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, in the face of these facts, in the face of the evidence in Document No. 62, sent by the President of the United States, that our generals at Paris told our commissioners that we were under great obligations to those people, to Aguinaldo and his army, for the capture of several thousand Spanish prisoners, for driving into the city of Manila and surrounding them with earthworks what was left of the Spanish forces in that country, it seems to me that it is pertinent and proper that the statement of Aguinaldo with regard to the facts connected with this transaction should be laid before the American people. If they can not be laid before the American people otherwise, if this resolution is not to be adopted, if you will not permit the statement to be printed as a document, then we will read it and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall object to it as treason and giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, which is what the Senator has been doing constantly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it is interesting to listen to the excitement of these people——

Mr. HAWLEY. Who are "these people?"

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Connecticut is one of them—who are afraid to lay before the American people the facts with regard to a transaction in which this Administration is wrong. If telling the truth, if disclosing what has occurred, is treason, then you can make the most of it. We will tell the truth. We will expose the things which have been done by this Administration, no matter what may be the result. The threat of treason, the talk about encouraging the enemy will not deter us from laying before the American people these glaring facts. If in struggling to prevent the destruction of this Republic, if upholding the Declaration of Independence, if resisting the treason of the President in violating the Constitution, which he has sworn to support, is treason, I am guilty; try me for treason.

Why, Mr. President, when this session opened a simple resolution asking for information was tabled by the majority in this body, and the purpose, evidently planned, was that nothing should be laid before the people of the United States. The policy of suppression in that way became too irksome, and, finally, the effort now is made to refer such resolutions to a committee, and thus smother investigation in that way.

Is this a Republic? Do the people rule? Are they no longer entitled to a knowledge of the history which we have made? Mr. President, locked up in the secrets of the State Department are the reports of our consuls in Cuba previous to the outbreak of the Spanish war. They have never been laid before this body; they have never been made public to the American people. The same course has been pursued through all this wretched business. It accords well with the idea that we shall establish in the place and upon the ruins of the Republic an empire, a government ruled without the knowledge or consent of the people.

If protesting against this is treason, if denouncing this thing is treason, then I am guilty, let the consequences be what they may.

Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to further debate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to discuss the question further this morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me rather harsh that, after the charges which have been made here under unanimous consent, those of us who take the opposite view should be suddenly cut off from all reply. There should surely be some fairness in such a matter. It has been charged here——

Mr. COCKRELL. We have not objected on this side.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is recognized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my objection to this pamphlet is not that it contains the truth, but that it is a mass of falsehoods. I want all the truth published, and I for one resent this continual heaping of slanders upon the men charged with our Departments and with our executive affairs, that they are holding back information from the American people. It is their one desire to lay everything before the American people; and when that mass of papers we have called for is put upon that desk and printed, the persons who will regret their appearance are not those who are supporting the Administration and its policy, but those who have slandered it here and elsewhere.

Mr. President, it has been stated here in so many words this morning that Admiral Dewey saluted the Filipino flag, that he recognized the independence of the Filipinos. These assertions are added to the charges in that lying pamphlet, translated and printed in Springfield, although the copy I saw purported to come from Luzon. I wish now and on this account to read the whole of Admiral Dewey's letter. I had no desire to bring Admiral Dewey into this any more than was absolutely necessary. I thought the few sentences that I had read were enough to show to the Senate, without any distinction of party or of difference of opinion on this case, that it was neither becoming nor proper to give the imprint of the United States to such material as this. Let us circulate the truth by all means, but do not let us circulate under the imprint of the United States branded slanders, which are attributed—whether rightly or wrongly I know not—to the authorship of a man who has been fighting the United States, or at least employing others to do so. I will read the whole letter:

The statement of Emilio Aguinaldo recently published in the Springfield Republican as far as it relates to me is a tissue of falsehood. I never promised him, directly or indirectly, independence for the Filipinos. I never treated him as an ally, except so far as to make use of him and his natives to assist me in my operations against the Spaniards. He never uttered the word "independence" in any conversation with me or my officers. The statement that I received him with military honors or saluted the Filipino flag is absolutely false.

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

Mr. President, we all know that the insurgent troops were used in the operations about Manila. This charge about saluting the Filipino flag and receiving Aguinaldo with military honors has been repeated and reiterated here day after day before the Departments have had time to send in the official facts; and now, in the presence of that denial from the most distinguished naval officer and Admiral of the United States, we are asked to send out, with the imprint of the United States, the slanders and the falsehoods contained in that pamphlet. I do not know what others may think, but as for the word of that pamphlet against the word of George Dewey, I take the word of George Dewey, as the people of the United States will take it, as final; and I do not think that the Senate of the United States ought to lend itself to any such business as this.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, no one, I think, in the Senate or in the country would countenance any attempt anywhere to diminish the exercise of what is precious to all of us—liberty of speech; but I believe the people of the United States—and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] asks whether they rule or not—must, in the circumstances of to-day, grow weary some time, if they have not already grown weary of the daily trial in the Senate Chamber, upon motions of inquiry, of the suit of Aguinaldo against the United States.

There ought to be a line drawn somewhere, Mr. President, in this matter. It may not perhaps be drawn in debate, but it may be drawn as to the placing upon the permanent records of this Senate of such communications as the Senator from South Dakota seeks by this rather evasive means to place upon them.

When before has it ever been proposed—and I do not intend to discuss the question as to what we shall do or what we ought to do in the Philippines, the question which the Senator from South Dakota daily seeks to discuss here—but when before has it been proposed in the Senate to place upon the records of this body a justification, or attempted justification, of his cause by a man in arms against the flag and against the Government of the United States? It is not simply a question whether the statements contained in that paper are true or false. So far as the American people are concerned, they will believe the statement of Admiral Dewey; and when the Senator from South Dakota asserts as a fact that Admiral Dewey saluted the flag of the so-called Philippine republic and Admiral Dewey says he did not, there will be no longer in the public mind, I think, if there ever has been, any question about it.

But here is a proposition to place upon the RECORD, coupled with a proposition yesterday to circulate it as a document printed by the Senate, a statement by a man in arms against our flag, spending his days and his nights in concerting measures by which he can kill the soldiers who rally around that flag—a statement intended to show that his cause is a just one and that our cause is not a just one.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SPOONER. In one moment.

Mr. President, my objection to that is not that it sends the truth over the country; it is the effect it will have upon Aguinaldo and his forces, for it will be taken to be an adoption by the Senate of the United States of his statement as a true statement, worthy under the public imprint to be sent throughout the country. Does it need any argument to show that the effect of such action by the Senate can not be otherwise than detrimental over there? Can it be otherwise than a direct encouragement to those in what I call insurrection against this Government and against our flag? Whatever the people may say after a while about this question when the war is ended, I think they stand by the Army of the United States, Mr. President, and that they will have no sympathy with any utterance, here or elsewhere, which endangers the life of one man wearing the uniform of the Federal Army and fighting 7,000 miles away under orders and under the flag.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator now yield?

Mr. SPOONER. In one moment.

Mr. RAWLINS. The question I desire to ask the Senator is directly in the line of what he is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I decline for one moment.

Mr. President, there has just reached San Francisco an American ship bearing to his last rest the body of General Lawton, killed on the firing line under our flag in the Philippines—as chivalrous a soldier as ever led a column into battle. He is dead. His broken-hearted widow and children are bringing him back to his own land and to a people who love him and admire him, not only for his long life of splendid military service, but for his gallantry and fidelity over there in the struggle against Aguinaldo and to carry forward our flag and the authority of the United States. Dead he is; but, Mr. President, he still speaks; and I want to read here on this occasion his opinion as to the effect of such propositions as this and some of the debate we listen to here upon the safety of the Federal Army:

I would to God that the whole truth of this whole Philippine situation could be known by every one in America as I know it. If the so-called anti-imperialists could honestly ascertain the truth on the ground and not in distant America, they, who I believe to be honest men misinformed, would be convinced of the error of their statements and conclusions and of the unfortunate effect of their publication here—

That is the point of his letter—

If I am shot by a Filipino bullet, it might as well come from one of my own men, because I know from observation, confirmed by captured prisoners, that the continuance of fighting is chiefly due to reports that are sent out here from America.

Mr. President, the debate will go on; these resolutions of inquiry and propositions like this will go on without doubt, but I venture to hope that there may be a truce—I ask only for a short one—until General Lawton's body may be brought from San Francisco and laid away in the spot which is to be his last home on earth.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. RAWLINS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the objection which I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to make in this case is to the placing of anything upon the RECORD which emanates from Aguinaldo, the leader of the armed insurgents against the United States. Is the Senator not aware of the fact that the Administration itself, in repeated documents sent to us, has made public many things emanating from that same source? And is it any more a violation of the obligation of patriotism for a member of this Senate to present a statement also from the same source bearing upon the condition of those distant islands than it is for a friend of the Administration or the Administration itself to do so; or are we to be content with precisely and only such facts as may come to us after the scrutiny of censorship; and are the American people to be kept in the dark as to the real situation, if only it is deemed necessary by those who are standing upon the threshold of a political campaign?

I would not and I do not think there is any member of this Senate who would desire to lend encouragement to any man in arms against the authority of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAWLINS. But when a letter is read here emanating from a distinguished general, who, with true patriotism and with sublime courage, has fought the battles of the Republic, and it is read here only for one purpose—to create a sentiment in support of a political propaganda; and when we know that that officer and other officers in those far-away islands have by rigid censorship been cut off from sources of information which are open to us, and which are open to the Administration, but not open to them—when a statement like that comes from General Lawton, we have in charity the right to say that he, like other officers in those distant islands, is not cognizant of all the facts relating to this situation.

Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I am interested in listening to the Senator, but I was recognized and simply yielded for a question.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from New Hampshire must remember that the Senator from Utah is asking me a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I am answering it as the Senator originally did my question, and I will give him an opportunity to respond.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Utah is not on the floor in his own right. My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is on the floor and yielded to the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] to put a question to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely the situation.

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield, and I regret that I intruded upon the time of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have remained silent during this session of Congress and remained silent during the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress when these questions were discussed. It has been a matter of extreme pain to me to listen to utterances in this Chamber that, in my judgment, have been calculated to give aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States. I am not going to use the word "treason." I am not going to utter a single sentence that can possibly be contorted into questioning the right of free speech as it is understood in the United States; but, Mr. President, I do want to say that, in my opinion, it is time that the kind of talk we have been listening to from the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] should cease in the Senate Chamber. It is an utter abuse of free speech.

A few days ago the Senator from South Dakota openly sneered at the American soldiers, charging that they had looted churches in the Philippines and had committed acts that were unworthy of soldiers of the United States. He went further, Mr. President, and charged that the President of the United States had used brutal language in a proclamation that he had issued to the Philippine people. When I courteously interrupted the Senator from South Dakota to ask him to quote the brutal language that he said the President had used, he very discourteously made reply, uttering words that he very properly, with my consent, left out of the RECORD in its printed form.

The contention to-day, it seems to me, is very simple. It is a question whether we shall believe a man who is in open rebellion against the authority of the United States or whether we shall believe the hero of Manila Bay. Aguinaldo makes certain charges; Admiral Dewey denies that those charges are true, pronouncing them "a tissue of falsehoods;" and it seems to me that the loyalty of the American people will come to the rescue of Admiral Dewey and that his words will be believed in preference to the words of a man who is to-day engaged in shooting down the soldiers of this Republic.

What does the Senator from South Dakota propose to put into the RECORD? What does he propose to print as a document that will be circulated free of postage over the United States? I want to read just a few words from the document that we are asked to print and circulate at the public expense.

When finally they turned their attention to the treaty of Paris—the ratification of which, as far as the same regarded the annexation of the Philippines, was hailed with cries of joy and satisfaction by the imperialistic party, whose leader Mr. McKinley was, then they opened their eyes to the light of the truth, perceiving with clearness the low policy, selfishness, and want of humanity which Mr. McKinley had pursued and shown toward the Filipinos, mercilessly sacrificing the honor of Admiral Dewey.

This man goes on further to narrate in detail, as he says, the cruelties that the soldiers of the Republic have perpetrated in the island of Luzon, and it is proposed seriously and soberly by a Senator of the United States that language such as that, emanating from a man in open revolt against the authority of the United States Government, shall be put in the RECORD, and shall be circulated over this country under the franking privilege of a Senator of the United States.

Mr. President, I am opposed to doing that thing, and I hope that some method will be found that will prevent documents of this kind being put in the RECORD, and that will stamp with disapproval the efforts which are being made to cast reproach upon our Army, upon our President, and upon the policy which the Government is pursuing in this contest with the Filipinos.

I have but a single word more to say, Mr. President. A few weeks ago I received from Manila a little newspaper, which it was said was being printed by the soldiers of the United States Army in the island of Luzon. I want to read an editorial utterance from that paper. Here it is:

The war in Luzon must go on; it was brought on by the overbearing natives, and there is only one course under heaven to pursue. The sovereignty of the United States must be acknowledged in the archipelago before the next step can be taken. Any other course would be folly. Why not cease this chatter about the independence of the Filipinos? People of America, if you have a flag, honor it; if you have a Government, support it; if you have an Administration, strengthen it; if you have troops at the front, uphold them.

Mr. President, that is the utterance of the soldiers who are fighting under the flag of our country seven or eight thousand miles away from this Capitol, and I commend it to the careful and prayerful consideration of all the Senators who are upbraiding the Administration, denouncing our soldiers, and doing all they can to bring into disrepute the efforts of our Government to subdue the rebellion. Let us honor our flag, support our Government, strengthen the Administration, and uphold our brave soldiers and sailors in their efforts to restore peace and good government in the Philippine Archipelago. That is our duty, and the American people will hold to a severe accountability any and every man who does otherwise.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] a few moments ago read what I understood to be a letter from General Lawton. I do not know where the letter came from, when it was written, or to whom; I do not know whether to the Senator or not.

Mr. SPOONER. It was not written to me.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I take it the letter was written by General Lawton, and I very heartily concur in the wish expressed by him in the beginning of that letter, when he said, as I remember it now, "Would to God that the whole truth there could be known."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated that the greatest desire of the public officers in this country was to have the facts understood. Mr. President, I submit, without any temper and without any feeling, that we can not fail to have faith in the intelligence of the people of this country. I believe that the wish expressed by General Lawton is a wise one, and the desire expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts for the circulation of the truth here is just what ought to be our rule of conduct. I believe the whole truth ought to be known.

I think the most unfortunate thing in connection with this whole difficulty was when the first resolutions of inquiry were offered here that without any moment of consideration, without a solitary syllable of time for thought, motions were made to lay them on the table, thus manifesting an intention to cut off debate, to suppress facts, to keep information away from Senators and from the people of the United States.

It has been the practice here for a great many years when eminent men give expression to sentiments touching public affairs that, on the request of a Senator, a document shall be printed giving what they may have said or written and that it shall appear in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a very recent practice.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It has been done again, again, and again, and without protest, ever since I have been in this body. I can name instances which I think will show the printing of such papers by the hundreds, if not by the thousands.

Mr. ALLISON. Only within very recent years. It is a custom that has grown up here within the last two or three years.

Mr. TELLER. Longer than that.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to cite the printing of documents prior to three or four years ago.

Mr. TELLER. It commenced longer ago than that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I can not undertake now to cite the documents that have been printed. I have no doubt the records will bear me out in what I say. When a few days ago I proposed to have printed a speech made in this city by an eminent Republican who has been a governor of his State, the State of Massachusetts, a temperate, reasonable, sensible, straightforward speech as I think—I heard the speech and I read it—the printing of it as a document was objected to by the Senator from Rhode Island; and why? Is it because the Senator from Rhode Island is unwilling to have the people of this country understand what a man of Governor Boutwell's experience and ability thinks upon these great public questions?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If so, it seems to me it is unfortunate that he is defending a position in public affairs which requires that sort of tactics.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. One moment. I believe, with General Lawton, that the whole truth ought to be told and the facts understood.

I do not know what is in the paper the Senator from South Dakota asked to have printed. If it is the truth, we ought not to be afraid of it. I have sufficient faith in the intelligence of the American people to believe that the printing of statements that are not true when they are confronted by the truth, as they can be and will be, will do no harm. On the contrary, the printing of a statement that is not the truth, coming from Aguinaldo, would recoil upon him and hurt him more than the refusal here to print a statement he has made.

Now, what the facts are I do not know, but I do believe we ought to have faith enough in the intelligence of the American people to believe that when they understand the whole case, when they have heard both sides of it, without any attempt to suppress a full statement on both sides, there will be no shadow of a doubt that they will arrive at a correct conclusion. I am astonished to find gentlemen on the other side who seem to be moved by a different conviction. Now I will listen to what the Senator from Rhode Island has to say.

Mr. ALDRICH. I simply intended to interject into the Senator's speech the statement that I did not object to Governor Boutwell making a speech or circulating it at his own expense wherever he pleased; I do not object to the national Democratic committee or its chairman printing that speech and circulating it as their own wherever they please; but I do object to the custom of printing political speeches by the Government of the United States and at its expense for circulation as political documents.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The small number of four or five hundred documents which would be printed by order of the Senate is a matter of too small moment to excite the Senator from Rhode Island to this extent.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is quite true; but the Senator does not want to stop there. He wants to send that speech by the thousands and hundreds of thousands throughout the United States as a political document at the expense of the United States and save the money of the national Democratic committee.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Whatever printing of that document would have to be done beyond the few hundred printed for the use of the Senate would have to be done at the expense of the men who wanted to circulate it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But there is the postage. There would be thousands and tens of thousands of dollars expended by the United States Government in circulating the political speeches of an ex-governor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Post-Office Department was intended to be a public convenience.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in that way.

Mr. TILLMAN. Your party does it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We understand by newspaper reports that there has been the most rigid censorship of the news allowed to come from Manila. If things can be found out which affect the public interest, and if you gentlemen believe you are right, you should have no fear of the public knowing it all. You can only fear the truth. It is not falsehood you fear, because you know perfectly well that the intelligence of the American people can be relied on not to be misled or duped or wheedled by misrepresentation. You have the opportunity. The officers are all on your side. They know all the facts. They can search the records. You can bring out everything to expose the falsity of anything that may be printed.

It is not from any partisan sense that I speak, but I do believe that there has been manifested in the Senate a desire to prevent the full truth from being known. I believe it as honestly as I believe my soul is my own, and believing that, I have no doubt there are thousands of other American people who believe the same thing.

Now, if you want the truth told, as General Lawton suggested and as the Senator from Massachusetts says the public officers want, let it be told. When a Senator comes here and desires to have printed a document which he believes will add to the sum of knowledge of the country on this subject, let it be printed; and if he chooses to go to the expense of having it printed for distribution, he ought to be allowed to do it. It does seem to me, without any feeling or temper, that the reasonable course is to allow this practice to go on as it has gone on.

Only a day or two ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] delivered a very able and eloquent speech outside of this Chamber. It was printed as a document by unanimous consent, because it is a matter of public interest. I never expect to object to anything of that kind.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Webster statue was given to the United States and accepted by a committee of Congress. That was an official proceeding.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was not a part of the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The speech was made away from here.

Mr. LODGE. It was an official proceeding of Congress, which has been repeated over and over about all the statues that have been presented to the nation.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly; I have no doubt of that, and that is only an illustration of what I was saying a while ago, that printing of this sort has been done time and time again.

Now, I would be very much better satisfied with the present situation if I felt sure that this spirit of censorship which has been exercised so rigidly in Manila was not, in my opinion, exercised with equal rigor in the Navy Department and the War Department in this city. If the Senate of the United States will make up its mind and say to the public, "You are entitled to know the whole truth in this matter and you can judge what is true and what is false," and will allow any Senator to come here on his motion bringing a paper that he believes to be worthy of consideration and present it to the Senate for printing, and let it be done in a reasonable way, I believe it will be much more satisfactory to the country and much more creditable to the management of this war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we do want the truth, and I can not too often reiterate it. My objection to this pamphlet is that it puts into Admiral Dewey's mouth words that he never uttered. It purports to be a report of things which he never said. We are not asked in this paper to circulate the truth. We are asked to circulate, as I have already stated, a branded lie.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the two statements be printed side by side and submitted to the intelligence of the American people.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be printed at the expense of the people who like such literature.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the ship which brought

General Lawton's body to this country brought also the body of one of my dearest friends, the adjutant of the First South Dakota Regiment, killed after the treaty of peace was signed, killed in a service in which he did not enlist, killed in a service which he believed was wrong. Yet, brave boy that he was, he led his forces to victory many a time and finally fell in that distant land.

Mr. President, I want a truce. I wanted it before my friend was killed. I wanted a truce before the sixty South Dakota boys were killed. Aroused by a just indignation and a grand patriotism and a splendid enthusiasm, they enrolled their names to drive from this continent the despotic power of Spain. But they are gone, drafted into an unwilling service and killed in an unwilling service, after they had a right to go home—after their term of enlistment had expired. With unparalleled bravery and courage they obeyed the commands of their President and went to their death.

The day after fighting began at Manila, Aguinaldo asked for a truce. He said, "Fix the limits of a zone which we shall occupy, and let us try, without bloodshed, to settle this difficulty;" and the answer was, "Fighting having once begun, it must go on to the grim end." But if the request had been granted, if the truce had been given, General Lawton would be living to-day and the South Dakota boys would be in the bosoms of their families instead of moldering in the soil of Luzon. Day by day, constantly from that time to this, the Filipinos fighting for freedom have sent their envoys asking for peace, begging a truce. The President at Fargo says Aguinaldo offered peace for independence. Peace for independence!

He said he had another price for peace a short time ago, but the United States never gave gold for peace. Aguinaldo did not ask gold for peace. He asked for that boon, dearer than life, which made our forefathers found this Government and which has brought into being every republic throughout the world. Fight until they surrender! If that rule had been applied, the war of the Revolution would still be going on. No self-respecting people would lay down their arms at such a challenge.

That the Filipinos have the capacity of self-government is demonstrated by that fact. All we have to do to stop bloodshed in the Philippines is to say to those people they shall have that priceless boon which is so dear to us and which they have shown is dear enough to them that they are willing to lay down their lives for it. Why shall we not do it? Why shall we continue this war of aggression? But a few provinces only in those islands have been conquered. Our troops occupy less than one-quarter of the area, and over the rest Aguinaldo's government still prevails. That is the situation to-day. All the provinces of northern Luzon are untouched, and the peaceful government which Sargent and Wilcox describe is still being carried on. Much of the southern part of Luzon is still unoccupied by our troops. Almost no portion of the other islands of the archipelago have been occupied by us. We are on the shore and in but a few places; and this war, in my opinion, will go on and on for years unless we say to those people that which we ought to say and say it at once, "You shall have your independence."

This talk about revolt, about fighting insurgents, it seems to me, is absurd. How can we have title without possession? I think it is a fair proposition, well sustained in international law, that when a country is purchased, possession must come in order to give sovereignty. Spain could not give any possession, because her power was ousted and another government existed in its place. There is no revolt; if we stop fighting, the war will be over.

The other day the Queen of England, in her message to the Parliament, made this statement:

> In resisting the invasion of my South African colonies by the South African Republic and Orange Free State my people have responded with devotion and enthusiasm to the appeal which I have made to them, and the heroism of my soldiers in the field and my sailors and marines who were landed to cooperate with them has not fallen short of the noblest traditions of our military history.

Here, then, is a charge that the Boers have attacked Great Britain. The same charge is made against the Filipinos, although the facts do not bear it out any more than they do in the case of the Boers. The excuse, then, is the cry of the flag, the appeal to patriotism, the effort to rally our people to sustain an Administration in doing the greatest wrong ever perpetrated by a government in the history of the world. It is the policy Great Britain has followed always, and she has become our teacher and our director in our affairs. Great Britain in all her conquests for the last fifty years first got in where she had no business to be, and has placed her armed forces in antagonism to the liberties of other people, and then when the flag was fired upon she has rallied her people to the defense of the flag.

She has said, "We can not talk peace. We can not listen to the proposition of right or wrong, or questions whether we had a right to be there or not, until the enemy surrenders." It was so in Ireland from the earliest day. Trouble occurred in Ireland because of resistance to oppression and aggression and wrong, and then they said, "The strong arm of British power must be used to suppress discontent in Ireland, and when it is suppressed then we will try and do right," never doing right when Ireland was pacified by power. Outbreaks again occurred, and then the same plea was made to the English people; and so it has been around the world.

The South African Chartered Company have killed in South Africa in the last twelve years 4,000 men and themselves have lost but five or six men, with the same old plea, adding territory after territory to their possessions; and now it is argued in the English Parliament, now it is insisted by the Queen of England, that the fighting must go on in South Africa until the two Republics in South Africa are destroyed. The same argument is heard here. Fighting must go on to the grim end, until these men struggling for freedom are all killed or lay down their arms and surrender, and then we will determine, without their being consulted, what shall be done with what is left.

Against this, Mr. President, I protest. I believe that it is an attack upon our institutions, a reversal of the history of this Government, and an abandonment of those doctrines which we have held so dear through all the years of our existence as a nation.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I do not know anything practically about the Boer situation, and I do not wish to take part in its discussion, but I do know something about our own relations to the Philippines. I was not in favor of the Philippine acquisition. I stated emphatically that the islands had a population of from eight to ten million people, a third of whom were civilized, the balance savages and pirates, and that as it took over a hundred years to control the remnant of the American Indians, it was a problem as to how long it would take us to civilize the population of the Philippines. Those were my own opinions; but my duty as a citizen of the United States is above my personal opinions. As soon as the treaty of Paris was concluded and ratified in this body, I sank all that I thought on this subject. I saw the flag attacked. I, as an American citizen, would like to have been there. In that attack on our flag my own personal opinion vanished, and with me it was the country and the flag, right or wrong.

I have followed the fortunes of that flag through all this controversy in the Philippines. I have a gallant son who was on the staff of Lawton and who went with him and received him with his death wound on the field, and I naturally have sympathy with him and with the officers of our Army. I deprecate beyond measure the action of the Senator from South Dakota. I should say that he is a traitor to his country under the circumstances. The idea of bringing in here a paper by the arch-traitor of Manila, the fellow who sold himself out to the Spaniards and now wants to sell himself to us, and defending it and wanting it to be published at the expense of the Congress of the United States, is to me outrageous in the extreme, beyond measure. That a man clothed with the dignity of a Senatorship of the United States, the representative of a sovereign State, should propose here that the man who is in opposition to us, who has carried on the war, should have this as a forum to advocate his own opinions, to be disseminated at large to the people of the United States at the expense of the Congress of the United States, is monstrous in the extreme.

Mr. President, the body of the distinguished Lawton, a personal friend of mine, as gallant a soldier as ever lived, arrived in San Francisco yesterday. The remains will be buried here in a few days. That distinguished gentleman and fine soldier, who was always at the front, stated to me that the war was continued by the men who had not accepted the situation as I had, notably Mr. PETTIGREW, from South Dakota. The life of Lawton is as much chargeable to him to-day as it is to the bullet of the Filipino.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether there is much profit in continuing these debates, but I merely wish to say a few words. In the first place, I want to speak of the custom that has grown up here of publishing documents. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] seems to think that it is of very recent occurrence. I will show the Senator that long before he or I came into the Senate the custom prevailed. I can recall some documents from outside people that were presented by Senators and published even before he came into the Senate. It has been intensified perhaps in later years, and I think occasionally abused, but it is a valuable privilege, and one that I think, under the proper discretion of the Senate, ought not to be interfered with. I do not think as a rule it will be very much abused.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] that there has not been quite that promptness on the part of those in power in responding to requests for information that there ought to have been, in my judgment. I believe I have voted in the affirmative for every resolution of inquiry, when a vote has been taken, because I believe that in all these affairs the way to have the Government sustained is to have the people understand what has been done, and I believe great harm is done by withholding from the public information on those matters in which they are interested.

Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] who has just taken his seat. I believe that every Senator here, under the responsibility that rests upon him as a Senator, has a right to stand on this floor, even in time of war, and if he does not think the proceedings of the Government are correct, he has a right to say so. He has a right under the responsibility that is put on him. He has a right to offer to put into the RECORD such things as he thinks proper. It must be a question for each Senator to decide for himself. I have voted, as I have said, with great liberality for all these resolutions for information and for putting articles in the RECORD. In this particular case, if it came to a vote, which I understand it will not under the ruling of the Chair, I should vote against putting it in. I should so vote because there is a question of veracity between the author of this paper and the Admiral who is quoted. If we send out this document, we do not send the Admiral's denial with it. If the poison goes out, the antidote does not accompany it. It seems to me, under the circumstances, that the Senator from South Dakota can safely and properly withdraw his proposition, although, perhaps, it has been ruled out by the Chair.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two more about the sensitiveness of some of our friends here as to criticisms of the Administration. I have not criticised it as a rule except in what appeared to me to be very plain cases. I do not know whether or not I am going to agree with the Administration when it comes to settle this question finally. If some Senators who have spoken on this floor have spoken for the Administration, which I do not believe they have, I should not agree with it, and I should be ready to criticise it freely. Our relatives across the water are having a very ugly war. They are divided as to the justice and righteousness of it. You will find, I think, without exception that the members of Parliament will stand up and express their opinions for and against the administration without interference, and I doubt very much whether any member will rise and call another a traitor because he sees fit to exercise what I think is the greatest right of a member of Parliament or a Senator—to criticise the administration of public affairs at any time when in his judgment it deserves it.

There is no reason, in my judgment, for these repeated charges on either side. On one side it is said that we who voted for the treaty have brought all this misfortune on the country and we are to blame. On the other side it is said that those who opposed the treaty have brought all this misfortune on the country and they are to blame. Each Senator here exercised his best judgment. He did it from the same patriotic standpoint. I believe myself that the interest of the United States—and I was looking after their interest and not that of the Filipinos—requires that we should ratify the treaty. I was anxious for its immediate ratification. I am impressed now with the belief that one of the mistakes was that we did not ratify it instanter. I will not charge that those who deferred the treaty brought on the war, but I felt all the time that there was great danger that we would have a war if we did not soon dispose of the question as to what our power was there, which we could not do pending the treaty.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, if the vote had been taken the day before it was taken, we would have ratified it at all?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that has nothing to do with the question. I will not be led off on that point. I repeat, my anxiety relative to the treaty was to prevent what did finally occur, and it is very possible that it would have occurred anyway. We are now engaged in a war. I can not myself but feel that I must stand up for the Government, for I do not believe there has been any intention on the part of this Administration in that respect to do anything wicked or bad. There may be errors of judgment; there may be mistakes; and yet we are in a war. I believe, Mr. President, that I know what the American feeling is. I believe it is that you have got to conclude a peace in those islands, that you have got to have authority there.

Mr. President, I do not have the great admiration for this insurgent chief, as he is called, that some of our associates have. I have admiration for any man who stands up and fights for what he thinks are his rights, and I have no doubt but that this man thinks he is fighting for his rights; however, his history, so far as I have been able to learn it, does not indicate to me that he has such a great interest in the rights of the masses of the Filipinos as some of our friends think. The kind of a government that he organized there was not such as to make me rate him with George Washington or any of the great lovers of liberty and law or the great statemen of the world. He had a government such as we could not endure, and such as no people who have the aspiration for freedom would ever have endured for any considerable length of time.

But, Mr. President, why should there be recrimination? Everybody says, on both sides of this Chamber, that we are going to stand by the Government until the war is over. That, I believe, the American people will exact of us; that I believe to be our duty; and when that has been done we will try and settle the other questions. We were compelled by the condition of affairs when the war with Spain was over to keep our Army there for a time at least. Does anybody suppose that if we had immediately withdrawn from Manila Aguinaldo would have been the chief of those islands to-day? Mr. President, there would have been a European flag flying there. Those islands would have been the prey of all Europe, and one nation or another, either with the consent of the other or without, would be dominating those islands at this hour.

Mr. President, they are the most valuable islands in the world. My interest in them is not that they are valuable, but that is the interest the rest of mankind have in them. That is the reason why three or four great European powers wanted to put up their flag there. Those islands are full of coal. Coal has become to-day as necessary in war between one nation and another as powder and guns. There are nations which have not much coal, and if they could have obtained control of those islands they would have been in a condition to dominate the Asiatic sea.

I do not think it is proper upon such an occasion to speak of the nationalities that might have raised their flag there. If we had withdrawn our troops in the condition that was there, no man can read the correspondence between Aguinaldo and General Otis but will believe that Aguinaldo himself intended to allow his troops to receive their compensation by looting the town, and when he had done that there was not a European nation that had citizens there that would not have had a right of intervention and would not have exercised that right. The ships of European countries were kept in the Asiatic sea that they might do it.

I say, Mr. President, we owed it to the world, we owed it to the peace of mankind that we kept our ships there and our soldiers there and that we kept control of those islands until after the treaty had been ratified, at least. Unfortunately, before the treaty was ratified we found ourselves engaged in a war. I am going to leave the consideration of the question whether it was right or wrong to the future to determine. I can not settle that question now, and it is not the time for any of us to undertake to settle it. Let those who made a mistake there, if mistake they made, or who acted corruptly, if corruptly they acted, take the consequences of their act when the act is fully understood. When peace shall have prevailed, when we shall settle down, I believe we will say to those people, What kind of a government do you want? What kind of a government are you capable of maintaining?

And I want to keep in mind, not only with reference to those people in the Asiatic seas, but the people on our coast, that those people will never under any condition of life and at no time in the future, in my opinion, be able to maintain such a government as we maintain and as our race will always maintain wherever it is dominant. But they have a right, Mr. President, to self-government as one of the inalienable rights of man. They have a right to it because they have shown that they belong to the race that are willing to fight for that they believe to be theirs. I do not believe there was ever a race that was willing to go to war in defense of its interests and rights but that is fit for free government, and I believe wherever you find a race that is organized into civilized communities that will do that, it is fit for self-government.

Mr. President, I believe our interests and our duty go together when we say to those people, "We will give you all the self-government consistent with the peace of the world—that is to say, we will let you manage your own affairs; we will see to it that nobody attacks you." I do not know that that will be the Administration's policy. I repeat, if the utterances of some Senators here speak for it, it will not be its policy. When it is not, I will challenge that policy as I have challenged every other that I know to be wrong. And until that is demonstrated it does seem to me that this question must be in abeyance; that it must be left; it must be determined by the conditions that exist when peace comes.

I said yesterday, and I repeat, that I feared the only peace which could be obtained there would be by the sword; and yet I repeat it is not beneath the dignity of this great nation of ours to say to those people, if they have an organization to which we can say it, "You were wrong in this matter; come and counsel with us;" and by diplomatic arrangements we can bring peace and order and submission for the moment to us, until we shall have an opportunity of establishing the government the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] yesterday spoke about, and which his resolution declares. We shall bring order by first establishing a government and then helping to support it until it shall get into proper form.

Mr. President, I have said this not because I have any particular admiration for the present Administration. I am not one of its admirers, and I am not an admirer of the policy of the Republican party in many ways. But I have always put above every party consideration the interests of my country. I believe that that is my duty first. I can see no other way out of this question with honor, and, Mr. President, I do not use the term in the sense that some men use it. I believe that we are under obligations to the world to maintain peace there, and, if it is necessary, to conquer a peace by war. I think we would deserve the contempt of mankind if we withdrew our army before we had established order and a condition that would protect not only the Filipinos, but the strangers who dwell at Manila and in other parts of that country.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I shall say what it seems to me it is my duty to say, and I shall say it as briefly as I can.

This man Aguinaldo has been exhibited before the world as an embezzler and a scoundrel. He is making a wholly unnecessary war, an unjustifiable war, against the people that delivered him and his people from Spanish control. He knows perfectly well that it is the intention and promise of the United States, practically, as time shall justify it, after peace shall have been restored, to lead them in the path of self-government, beginning with the humblest beginnings, in establishing municipalities, in encouraging internal improvements and education and religious institutions. He knows all that well. He has only to stop fighting in order to have his people come under the guardianship and generous aid of a great nation of 75,000,000 people.

Now, he publishes this document. The Senator from South Dakota wants it published. It is published already. It is open to any of the gentlemen who like that sort of thing to subscribe a few thousand dollars to circulate it everywhere. But suppose it goes into Manila and is thought a good thing to spread among the soldiers of the United States, what is the inevitable effect of it? To discourage the soldiers, to encourage desertion; and everywhere else it goes the inevitable effect is to discourage enlistment. Is not this to aid and comfort the enemies of the country? It is done deliberately, with a clear knowledge of what will be the result of the action; and the law says that a man shall be responsible for that which is the inevitable effect of what his action is. If he fires a loaded gun down a crowded street he is supposed by the law to intend murder.

I think the men who wish to circulate this document are to be responsible for some of the blood that is shed, and that, I am sorry to say, will have to be shed, before peace has been established there.

Another observation, and perhaps I will quit.

The Senator from South Dakota does not, like a fair-minded man, propose to publish with the Aguinaldo statement the letter of Admiral Dewey, because that would stamp Aguinaldo as a liar, as we know he is. His friend is a liar, an embezzler, a thoroughgoing scoundrel. He stands by him, and Aguinaldo doubtless considers the Senator his particular friend, and will take good care to publish his remarks among all his so-called constituents, among his troops. And yet the Senator from South Dakota poses as a friend of his country!

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for ten minutes?

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator wish to have the unfinished business set aside?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. I will yield for five minutes to the Senator, but I will give way to no one else after that time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Five minutes is not long enough.

Mr. BERRY. I want to go on with the financial bill, but I will yield to the Senator. I wish to say, however, that I would not have yielded to anyone but the Senator from South Dakota. He was, as I conceive, attacked personally, and I therefore yield him such time as he wants for the purpose of making a statement in regard to the matter which has been under consideration.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not care to reply to the personal attack upon me, nor to the charge that I am a traitor to my country. I yield to no man in my devotion to my country and my flag. I am jealous of her honor, and I believe that her honor can only be saved from stain by a reversal of the policy into which this Administration has led us. I believe that only by protesting against the violation of our pledges and against the overthrow of all the principles upon which this Government is founded, by insisting upon returning to the doctrines of the fathers, to the principles of the Declaration of Independence—that governments must derive their just powers only from the consent of the governed—can we save our flag from stain and country from dishonor.

That is as much of a reply as I care to make to the insinuations of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] or the statement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Now, with regard to Aguinaldo, they charge that I am defending a forger and a bribe taker and a scoundrel upon this floor. I will simply read from the record sent to us by the President upon that subject. I will read from Document 62, from the official reports by our officers in Luzon, and we will see whether the statement is sustained by the facts.

Last year the President of the United States in sending the Spanish treaty to this body accompanied it with a document which contained the reports of our consuls in the East and our officers in Luzon. It is presumed that he knew the contents of the document, that he was not ignorant of the records of his own department. Yet October 13, 1899, the President, at Fargo, in North Dakota, said:

> The leader of the insurgent forces says to the American Government, "You can have peace if you give us independence." Peace for independence! He had another price than that for peace once before, but the United States pays no gold for peace. We never gave a bribe for peace in all our history, and we never will.
> Wherever that standard is raised, it stands for liberty, for civilization, and humanity.

The President thus charges that Aguinaldo sold out to Spain, reiterating a charge that had been proven false by the repeated statements of his officer; repeating a charge that was conclusively proven untrue by the records of the Department of State.

The charge is now made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body [Mr. HAWLEY], the Senator from Connecticut, that Aguinaldo sold out to Spain. In Document No. 62, transmitted to us by the President, on pages 380 and 381, General Merritt says:

> There are a number of Filipinos whom I have met, among them General Aguinaldo and a few of his leaders, whom I believe thoroughly trustworthy and fully capable of self-government. * * * Aguinaldo, honest, sincere, and poor; not well educated, but a natural leader of men, with considerable shrewdness and ability, highly respected by all.

In a memorandum which General Greene presented to the peace conference at Paris he says:

> In August, 1896, an insurrection broke out in Cavite under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo, and soon spread to other provinces on both sides of Manila. It continued with varying successes on both sides, and the trial and execution of numerous insurgents, until December, 1897, when the governor-general, Primo de Rivera, entered into written agreement with Aguinaldo, the substance of the document which is in the possession of Señor Felipe Agoncilla, who accompanied me to Washington.
>
> In brief, it required that Agoncilla and the other insurgent leaders should leave the country, the Government agreeing to pay them $800,000 in silver and promising to introduce numerous reforms, including representation in the Spanish Cortes, freedom of the press, general amnesty for all insurgents, and the expulsion or secularization of the monastic orders.
>
> Aguinaldo and his associates went to Hongkong and Singapore. A portion of the money, $400,000, was deposited in banks at Hongkong, and a lawsuit soon arose between Aguinaldo and one of his subordinate chiefs named Artacho, which is interesting on account of the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo.

"On account of the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo."

> Artacho sued for a division of the money among the insurgents according to rank. Aguinaldo claimed that the money was a trust fund, and was to remain on deposit until it was seen whether the Spaniards would carry out their promised reforms, and if they failed to do so, it was to be used to defray the expenses of a new insurrection. The suit was settled out of court by paying Artacho $5,000.
> No steps have been taken to introduce the reforms, more than 2,000 insurgents, who have been deported to Fernando Po and other places, are still in confinement, and Aguinaldo is now using the money to carry on the operations of the present insurrection.

This was written August 30, 1898. He took that money and used it as our ally to fight Spain, to buy guns and ammunition to carry on the contest against the common enemy; and yet he is charged with being a bribe taker and a scoundrel.

Oscar F. Williams, our consul at Manila, writes to Mr. Day, the Secretary of State, May 25, 1898, on page 328 of Document 62:

> To-day I executed a power of attorney whereby General Aguinaldo released to his attorneys in fact $400,000 now in bank in Hongkong, so that money therefrom can pay for 3,000 stand of arms bought there, and expected here to-morrow.

Mr. Wildman, our consul at Hongkong, reports to Assistant Secretary Moore exactly the same story, on pages 336 and 337, in Document No. 62. I will not read it, because it is long, but I will insert it, if there is permission, in my remarks.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> I have lived among the Malays of the Straits Settlements and have been an honored guest of the different sultanates. I have watched their system of government and have admired their intelligence, and I rank them high among the semicivilized nations of the earth. The natives of the Philippine Islands belong to the Malay race, and while there are very few pure Malays among their leaders, I think their stock has rather been improved than debased by admixture. I consider the forty or fifty Philippine leaders, with whose fortunes I have been very closely connected, both the superiors of the Malays and the Cubans. Aguinaldo, Agoncillo, and Sandico are all men who would all be leaders in their separate departments in any country, while among the wealthy Manila men who live in Hongkong and who are spending their money liberally for the overthrow of the Spaniards and the annexation to the United States, men like the Cortes family and the Basa family, would hold their own among bankers and lawyers anywhere.
> There has been a systematic attempt to blacken the name of Aguinaldo and his cabinet on account of the questionable terms of their surrender to Spanish forces a year ago this month. It has been said that they sold their country for gold, but this has been conclusively disproved, not only by their own statements but by the speech of the late Governor-General Rivera in the Spanish Senate June 11, 1898. He said that Aguinaldo undertook to submit if the Spanish Government would give a certain sum to the widows and orphans of the insurgents. He then admits that only a tenth part of this sum was ever given to Aguinaldo, and that the other promises made he did not find it expedient to keep.
> I was in Hongkong September, 1897, when Aguinaldo and his leaders arrived under contract with the Spanish Government. They waited until the 1st of November for the payment of the promised money and the fulfillment of the promised reforms. Only $400,000, Mexican, was ever placed to their credit in the banks, and on the 3d of November Mr. F. Agoncillo, late minister of foreign affairs in Aguinaldo's cabinet, called upon me and made a proposal, which I transmitted to the State Department in my dispatch No. 19, dated November 3, 1897. In reply the State Department instructed me "to courteously decline to communicate with the Department further regarding the alleged mission." I obeyed these instructions to the letter until the breaking out of the war, when, after consultation with Admiral Dewey, I received a delegation from the insurgent junta, and they bound themselves to obey all laws of civilized warfare and to place themselves absolutely under the orders of Admiral Dewey if they were permitted to return to Manila. At this time their president, Aguinaldo, was in Singapore negotiating through Consul-General Pratt with Admiral Dewey for his return.

On page 347 of Document No. 62 Mr. Pratt, our consul at Singapore, June 2, 1898, makes the following statement to Mr. Day:

No close observer of what had transpired in the Philippines during the past few years could have failed to recognize that General Aguinaldo enjoyed above all others the confidence of the Filipino insurgents and the respect alike of Spaniards and foreigners in the islands, all of whom vouch for his high sense of justice and honor.

Mr. Schurman, in his Chicago interview (and this is the only authority I will read which is not vouched for by official documents) August 20, 1899, said:

[President Schurman Chicago interview, August 20, 1899.]

General Aguinaldo is believed on the island to be honest, and I think that he is acting honestly in money matters, but whether from moral or political reasons I would not say.—Oriental American, page 99.

The fact of the matter is that he tried to bribe the insurgents, as near as we can ascertain, and failed; they would not take gold for peace.

Now, I should like to ask the imperialists in this body what they think of a President who will go about the country saying that Aguinaldo had another price for peace, in the face of the official documents from his own officers in the State Department, where they declare that he acted with the highest sense of honor, that he took no bribe, but, on the contrary, deposited the money, and used it, when Spain failed to carry out her promises, to help us fight the Spanish forces?

What do you think of a President that will state that the United States never did give gold for peace, and never will, and then approve of the treaty with the Sultan of Sulu, which provides that we shall pay to the Sultan $250 per month and to his subchiefs a sum which in all amounts to $9,200 per year? In view of all these facts, of what future value is any statement the President may make upon this subject? Mr. President, I can not contemplate the fact without great sorrow that a man can occupy so high a position as that of President of the United States and yet disgrace that great office by repeated falsehoods—falsehoods proven so by the record of his own officers sent to us.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I realize how difficult it is to get the attention of the Senate on a subject different from that which has been discussed so long and ably this morning; but the measure known as the financial bill, which is the unfinished business of the Senate, is now the regular order of business to be debated, and it will be voted on upon the 15th day of February. This is a House bill. It has passed the House of Representatives, and it was reported here by the Committee on Finance of the Senate with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. However, the bill as it passed the House is before the Senate, and the remarks I shall make this afternoon will be directed to the House bill, for the reason that I am of the opinion that finally it is the House bill practically which will be passed by Congress and approved by the President.

I believe this, Mr. President, from the fact that it was the caucus bill of all the Republican members of the House. They held a caucus and agreed on this House bill, and it commanded the vote of every Republican member of the lower House of Congress. Therefore, I say it is the bill which the Republican Congress, as I presume, intend to pass and go to the country on at the election next fall. I have come to that conclusion from another reason, that the leading newspapers of the country which represent the national banks say that the House bill is preferable to the amendment reported by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and that it is the House bill they desire; and I have never yet known the Republican party to fail to yield to the demands of the national banks on any important question, when that demand was made known.

I therefore take it for granted that the House bill will be the law, after the President has signed it, upon which the Republican party will stand. It may be true that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will succeed in getting on it some language that will tend to obscure the meaning of the bill or tend to confuse the situation somewhat. It is probably true that he will get language inserted in the bill which will enable the Republicans throughout the Western States to insist in the coming campaign that the bill means one thing, while the Republicans in the East will insist that it means another, and finally the Secretary of the Treasury will decide that the construction put upon it by the Eastern Republicans is the proper construction. I say the Senator from Iowa may get that accomplished. Without meaning any disrespect to him, I will say that no man is better calculated to write an amendment which would tend to confuse the situation and obscure the meaning of words than the Senator from Iowa.

Now, Mr. President, before I refer to the provisions of the bill, I should like to ask that the Senators who support it will tell the Senate and tell the country what is the necessity for the passage of such a measure. Every Republican member who spoke on behalf of this finance measure in the House of Representatives said that universal prosperity prevails in the country, that trade had never been so good, that capital was seeking labor, and that this prosperity existed to an extent which it had not existed for years. If that be true under the present law, I would ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to tell me why it is necessary at this time to so radically change the present law, particularly if no good is to be brought to the country by it?

When it is said that universal prosperity exists under the present law, those who make such a declaration are either not sincere in it or they are anxious by this legislation to change that situation for the worse. I want to say, so far as I believe, that the statement regarding prosperity all over this country is not true. It is true that the discovery of gold in Colorado, in Alaska, and in South Africa during the last few years has tended to increase prices and to make business better than it was before that time. It has been stated by one of the members of the other House that the production of gold in 1899 was equal to the production of both gold and silver in the year 1895. If that be true, and if that has increased prosperity, I would ask if those who favored the free coinage of silver were not correct when they said that an increase of the money of final redemption would tend to increase prices and to bring about prosperity?

If, in 1890, when the Sherman law was passed, you had passed a law for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and thereby brought into circulation the same amount of money of final redemption which gold alone brings in to-day, that prosperity which you claim has now come would have come in 1891, and we should have been saved all the distress which has followed by reason of an insufficient amount of money and the consequent reduction of prices. Those prices began to go down during the latter years of Harrison's Administration, and the decline continued during all the years of Cleveland's Administration. I say, if this increased production of gold has increased prices, then if both gold and silver had been coined, the silver money would have increased the circulation to about the same amount which the gold has to-day, and prosperity would have come in 1891 instead of 1899. But if it be true that this increased production of gold has increased prosperity and somewhat improved business prospects, if we will also coin silver to-day at the ratio provided by law, that prosperity will be increased many fold over that which now exists.

Then, Mr. President, as I said, if it be true that prosperity is general throughout the country, I would ask the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] why he brings this bill here to-day? You can not make it better, and do you not fear you will make it worse? If the House bill takes out of circulation 482,000,000 of silver dollars and $346,000,000 of United States Treasury notes, known as greenbacks, and ties them up in the Treasury, do you not believe that it will tend to depress prices throughout the country and to destroy this additional prosperity which you say has come?

Now, let us for a short time examine the bill. The first section provides:

That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

If that be the law to-day, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island to tell the Senate what is the necessity for reenacting it? Is it because you are so anxious to do to-day what you said in 1893 you never intended to do? Is it because you want to show to the country that in 1892, when you made your Republican platform and declared in favor of bimetallism, both gold and silver, that you were insincere in that declaration and never intended to carry it out? Is it because in 1896 your platform declared that you were in favor of international bimetallism, yet to-day so anxious are you to show the national bankers of the East that you are in favor of the single gold standard that you put it into this act, yet you claim that it is already the law?

In 1893, when the unconditional repeal of the Sherman Act was before Congress, every Senator upon the Republican side of this Chamber and every Senator in the Chamber save and except the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] declared that he was unalterably opposed to the single gold standard and in favor of bimetallism—the coinage of both gold and silver—and to-day you bring here a bill the first section of which says that we hereby establish the gold standard.

Section 2 of the House bill provides:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States, as defined in section 1 of this act.

This section says that all existing bonds and those which may be hereafter issued shall be paid in gold. Will some one who advocates the bill tell me what benefit can come to the country at large by changing this contract? The existing bonds are now payable either in gold or silver at the option of the Government, and you now propose to make them payable in gold alone. What consideration comes to the United States? What do the people who are to be benefited agree to give in order to have their contract changed from one payable in coin to one payable in gold?

I assert, Mr. President, that every outstanding obligation of this Government to-day is payable either in gold or silver at the option of the Government. Those bonds upon their face show that they are payable in coin at the ratio which existed on the 14th of July, 1870, which was either gold or silver, not at the option of the holder, but at the option of the Government. That is in the law itself and it is on the face of the bonds. I have here a copy of one of the bonds payable in 1907, which shows specifically that the Government reserved the right to pay in either gold or silver. It reads:

1877. Four per cent consols of the United States. 1907.
Principal and interest payable in coin.
(50)
At the Treasury of the United States.
The United States of America are indebted to the bearer in the sum of 7115. fifty dollars. 7115.

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870," amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Washington, July 1, 1877.

S. J. MILLARD,
Register of the Treasury.

Act of July 14, 1870.

And yet, without any demand from the great body of the people of this country, you come here to-day and voluntarily change this contract into one which the holders of bonds think more desirable, without compensation being made to the Government, and you give to the bondholders a gold bond for one which the Government now has the right to redeem in silver.

When the last issue of bonds was made during the latter part of Mr. Cleveland's second Administration, the President sent a message to the Congress of the United States, in which he said if Congress would give him authority to issue bonds payable in gold coin, he could receive a much larger price for them than for bonds which were authorized under the existing law payable in coin; and a bill was brought into the Senate by the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Vilas, the title of which was "A bill to save the Government $16,000,000."

It was alleged by him and by Republican Senators that the bankers who were going to purchase those bonds would give the Government $16,000,000 more for them if the Government would insert in the bonds a clause that they were to be payable in gold. That was specifically stated by the friends of the bill. Congress refused to give this authority, being unwilling to issue gold bonds, but bids were made for the bonds, and they were purchased for $16,000,000 less than would have been paid for them if it had been provided that the bonds should be payable in gold.

Notwithstanding those bonds were purchased for $16,000,000 less, as I have said, it is now proposed, without the holders of the bonds paying one cent to the Government, to change them into gold bonds. What think you, Mr. President, of such a proposition? What kind of justice is this to the great body of the people of the United States? Who is to be benefited by this legislation? No one save and except the holders of those bonds, the men who purchased them for a smaller price because they were payable in either gold or silver; and now, without any reason, save and except that you want to gratify them, and they make this demand, the Republican members of the House of Representatives solidly have said, "We will change this contract and pay the holders of those bonds in gold."

I pass over section 3, which provides for the establishment in the Treasury Department of a division to be designated and known as the division of issue and redemption, etc., and come to the fourth section of the bill, which provides:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund, etc.

After some other provisions about the making of transfers, the section provides:

And in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year.

Here is a power conferred upon a single individual to issue the bonds of this Government to be payable in gold, and without any limit save and except his own judgment as to how many he shall issue. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury thinks it necessary to issue bonds, he may issue $1,000,000 worth, or $100,000,000 worth, or $1,000,000,000 worth, so far as the law goes, and there is no power to prevent him from doing it. You give this power to one individual who has shown himself the friend and ally of the national banks of this country and the special friend of particular banks in which he has left the money of the United States so as to aid them to improve their credit; and you confer upon him this great power, which in olden times was never conferred upon any individual.

In the past the Congress of the United States kept the control of the issuance of bonds in time of peace within their own power, and they alone had the right to determine how many and what bonds should be issued; yet this proposed law says that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue as many bonds as, in his judgment, he may deem proper in order to maintain the gold reserve.

Why should this great power be conferred upon any individual, I would ask, Mr. President? You may say that the power will not be abused. I answer that that the Secretary of the Treasury can abuse it. I answer that you turn over to an individual a power which the Constitution left in Congress itself—to determine as to the amount of debt this Government should become involved in. Under this section, if the Secretary of the Treasury sees proper, he may issue bonds payable in gold which will be binding on the honor of the country and on the generations to come. Do you think it well to put such a provision in a bill of this character without any limit?

But that is not all of section 4. Further along it provides:

And if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. The notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged.

You confer by that section power on the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem every outstanding silver dollar in the United States of America in gold, to redeem every United States Treasury note, amounting to $346,000,000, in gold, and you provide that that money shall not be reissued or disbursed except for gold; and yet you say that you do not intend to tie up the greenbacks and the silver in the country. It may be that the Senate substitute does not do so, but the House bill, for which every Republican member of that body voted, specifically provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may do that thing and thereby take out $800,000,000 from the circulation of this country—$482,000,000, I think it is, in silver and $346,000,000 in greenbacks.

Mr. President, I ask the Republicans who live in the western portion of our country if they are willing to confer power upon the Secretary of the Treasury to take out of circulation all the silver dollars and all the greenbacks—because the bill says he may exchange them for any money issued or coined, which includes both—to be covered into the Treasury and not to be paid out except for gold coin? Are you willing to go to your constituents on a record of that kind?

In 1896 my colleague in the House of Representatives [Mr. MCRAE] sent a letter to the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, inquiring whether or not silver dollars could be or were redeemed in gold at the Treasury. He was answered by the Assistant Secretary, who said that the silver dollars, being money of final redemption, were not redeemable in anything, and therefore the Treasury Department did not exchange gold for silver dollars. Later on, when Mr. Carlisle was pressed, in the latter part of the Presidential canvass, for information as to why silver dollars were as good as gold dollars, yet were not redeemable in gold, he was forced to say that if it became necessary he would redeem the silver dollars in gold.

It is true there was no law to authorize such redemption; but with one exception no Secretary of the Treasury, I think, since the war has ever held himself bound by the letter of the law where the national banks demanded that he should do otherwise. That exception, I think, was Daniel Manning, who was Secretary of the Treasury in Mr. Cleveland's first Administration. I repeat, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stated—and he told the truth—that silver was not redeemable in gold; but under the stress of the canvass later on Secretary Carlisle said that, if necessary, he would redeem it in gold.

Now, we have a bill here which it is proposed to pass through this Congress, and which has already passed the House of Representatives, which provides that the silver dollars may be redeemed in gold, and which provides also for the redemption in gold of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks, which you have asserted again and again you never intended to retire, and when we claimed that you would eventually do so you said the statement was untrue and false, and yet your party in the House of Representatives voted solidly for a proposition to tie up $346,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States, providing that it can only be paid out by being exchanged for gold, thereby repealing the present law, which authorizes it to be used to meet the expenses of the Government.

Is that all, Mr. President? I think there are a few other provisions in this bill to which I shall allude which are very objectionable. Passing over several of the sections, I come to the provision which authorizes the national banks to receive the full face value or the par value of the bonds deposited in the Treasury of the United States that they may issue their notes, thus changing the law as it now stands, which is that they can only issue 90 per cent of the bonds deposited. Will any Senator tell me why the banks should have this additional advantage? What reason is there for it? It can not be said that it is in order to increase the circulation of money, because the same bill ties up $800,000,000 in the Treasury, thereby taking it out of circulation. That, then, is not the reason.

The only reason, Mr. President, why it is done is that the national banks have demanded this additional concession. They can make more money if they are allowed to issue their circulating notes to the extent of 100 per cent than they can at 90 per cent. They have asked Congress to do this for them, and the House of Representatives has already responded to that demand.

The next proposition to which I refer is one which reduces the taxes which the national banks are now required to pay.

Section 10 provides that hereafter the national banks shall pay upon the amount of their capital stock two-tenths of 1 per cent annually in the way of taxation. Under the law to-day they pay 1 per cent, I think, upon their circulation. Whilst I have not calculated accurately the reduction, I will say that this bill, if it becomes a law, will reduce by at least one-half the amount in the way of taxes which the national banks are now required to pay.

I should like Senators from the West who intend to vote for this bill, when they go before their Western constituents, to tell them, when taxes are imposed upon every deed, mortgage, and every check that their people draw, upon many of the medicines they are compelled to buy, and upon various other things, why it is that this Republican Congress steps in and provides that the only tax that shall be removed or reduced in any way whatever is the tax on national banks. Why are they more entitled to our consideration than other people in the land? Are they so poor that they can not pay the 1 per cent tax? Are they the people that the Congress of the United States, in endeavoring to relieve the distress of the country, should select, of all classes, reduce by one-half the taxes which they are to pay, and at the same time absolutely refuse to reduce the taxes to which I have already referred? Do you think such a bill is in the interest of the people at large, or is it a bill in the interest of national banks? There can be no reason for enacting such a law save and except the desire to accommodate those banks.

What, then, can Senators say when they are asked why they did not reduce the taxes on various necessities, why they did not take the tax off deeds and mortgages, why they do not remove it from patent medicines? You may answer that a war was in progress and that it was necessary to have money to prosecute that war. If that be true, why do you propose to reduce by one-half the taxes on the national banks, which are more able to bear taxation than any class of citizens in the country?

There is one other feature of the bill, Mr. President, to which I desire to allude, and then, after a few remarks on the bill generally, I shall conclude.

Under this bill the finances of the country are to be turned over absolutely to the national banks, the greenbacks are to be retired, the silver dollars are no longer to be considered money, and the single gold standard is to be established. Then you leave it in the power of the national banks to expand or contract the currency at their will. It is, you say, an elastic currency. Yes, it is an elastic currency when the national banks hold both ends of the elastic string and can pull it out or contract it as may conduce to their interest; and at the same time you say that the bill is in the interest of the people of the United States. What people, save and except the bondholders and the men who are running the national banks?

I have not gone into the details of the bill so minutely as did the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], but I hope the people of the country will examine the bill, and see if, from the beginning to the end of it, every word is not so framed and intended as to benefit the two particular classes of our citizens to whom I have referred.

Take the bill altogether, and what does it provide? That gold, and gold alone, shall be the standard money; that all bonds of the Government, which by the law and on their face are payable in either gold or silver at the option of the Government, shall hereafter be payable in gold. Not only this, but it provides also that all private contracts shall be payable in gold. It authorizes the national banks to issue bank notes to the full amount of bonds placed on deposit with the Treasury, and to expand or contract the currency of the country at their will; it reduces the tax to be paid by the national banks on their circulation by one-half; it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, at his own option, responsible to no man, with no appeal from his judgment, to issue interest-bearing gold bonds, without any limit as to amount save and except such as in his judgment he shall think proper. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem all outstanding silver dollars and United States Treasury notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and the Sherman notes named in the law of 1890, in gold, and to tie them up and keep them in the Treasury, thereby reducing the circulation something over $800,000,000.

There is not one word or sentence in this bill for the benefit of the great body of our people who are engaged in agriculture. There is not one letter or one sentence in the bill which would tend to increase the price of labor or make the burdens of our laboring people less heavy than they now are. There is not one word or sentence in this bill which could be of any benefit to any class of citizens of the United States save and except the two classes I have named. The holders of United States bonds and the national banks are by the provisions of this bill to be the sole beneficiaries. I repeat, that you can search the bill from the beginning to the end and it does the identical thing I have said. It gives those men everything they have asked and places the finances of this country absolutely under the control of the national banks.

It confers power upon the Secretary of the Treasury to issue unlimited bonds, and under the present law, which it leaves in force, the Secretary of the Treasury can take the money collected in the way of internal-revenue taxes from the people and place it in the keeping of any favorite bank that he may select anywhere in the United States of America. No remedy for that is offered in this bill. Already, by his own report made to the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury has admitted that, under the law which authorized the sale of a Government building in the city of New York, a bank in that city purchased the building for something more than $3,000,000, that they paid to the Secretary of the Treasury or brought a check here to this city to pay it to him, for more than $3,000,000, leaving a small balance unpaid.

The law said that that should be turned into the Treasury of the United States, but the Secretary said to that bank, "I have the right to deposit moneys in certain banks. You take back these $3,000,000 and keep it in your bank, loan it out to whom you see proper, at such interest as you can get, and in the meantime I will pay you a large amount of rent upon behalf of the Government for that building;" and no deed was made because until a deed was made the bank was not responsible for taxes that were levied upon it. Yet this has been done and the pending bill seeks not to remedy such wrongs, but confers upon the Secretary this power to issue bonds until he can get sufficient money not only to aid one of his national-bank friends, but many throughout the country.

Now, I submit to the Senator from Iowa whether he thinks that this bill conforms to the profession which has been so often made by him and the leaders of his party on the floor of the Senate. He having voted on this floor that the Government bonds were payable legally, morally, and equitably in silver, why does he come in to-day and voluntarily give the bondholders what they ask and say to them, "We will change your contract and will pay you in gold?"

Mr. ALLISON. Where do I say that?

Mr. BERRY. You said that in the Stanley Matthews resolution, for which you voted.

Mr. ALLISON. Where in the Senate amendment, for which I hold myself partially responsible, do we propose to change the contract?

Mr. BERRY. I will read it. You said in the Stanley Matthews resolution that the Government had a right legally, equitably, and morally to pay the United States bonds in silver. You do not deny that. You do not deny you voted for that resolution. You say, "Where have I sought to change it?" I will read from the House bill which was passed, commanding the vote of every Republican in the House.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator was standing me up here for inquiry and not the House. Now, the Finance Committee on the part of the Senate not only does not assent to the provisions of the House bill, but provides a substitute for every section of it; and if the Senator wishes to arraign me in any way as respects my former record or what I now propose, I trust he will confine his debate to what is in the substitute, for which I will be responsible in part and which, to the best of my ability, at the proper time I will defend.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Iowa was not in the Chamber when I began the remarks in which I stated that in my opinion the House bill would become the law and that I would confine my remarks to that bill. He says he is not responsible for it. I tell him that the Republican party, and every member belonging to it in the House of Representatives, in caucus and on the floor of the House, voted for the bill which I have read, and it says that the bonds shall hereafter be payable in gold.

It may be that he would rather confuse, as I said a while ago, and somewhat obscure the meaning of that measure before he goes before the people in the national election, but it is the bill demanded by the national bankers, and I said your party never yet has failed to respond to every demand that they made; and if they still command it, it will be passed whether you agree to it or not. Therefore I referred to him because he had cast a vote. I will name to him another distinguished citizen of this Republic who voted for the Stanley Matthews resolutions—William McKinley, a member of the House of Representatives at that time. He said and voted that the bonds were morally, legally, and equitably payable in silver if the Government thought proper to pay silver.

Now, I say that the House has done this, and so I can only take the House bill; and with all the Senator's ability and his high standing I want to say that all the members of the House of Representatives are better evidence of what the Republican party will do than even the Senator from Iowa, united with the other members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not responsible, except in a very small way, for what the Republican party may do. I was not speaking for the Republican party; but I understood the Senator to say that the present bonds, being payable in coin, we propose now in this bill—that I proposed and I understood him to mean that the Senate amendment proposed——

Mr. BERRY. I never referred to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I am glad the Senator did not.

Mr. BERRY. I did not.

Mr. ALLISON. Because it relieves him of the responsibility of failing to be familiar with the bill.

The Senator says that a committee of conference in the future is going to make some bill other than the one which the Committee on Finance, of which I happen to be a member, reported.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If my colleague will permit me——

Mr. BERRY. One minute; then I will yield. I ask the Senator if the House bill is not before the Senate now—the bill I am discussing? Is there not before the Senate the bill that passed the House of Representatives? Answer once in your life direct, yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator has put a question to me——

Mr. TELLER. Categorically.

Mr. ALLISON. And I will answer it now, if he will allow me, without interruption, in my own way.

Mr. BERRY. All right.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the House bill is pending here. It would be singular if it were not pending. It does not require a Senator to know that. Having passed the House, it must be here; but it was referred to a committee of this body, of which I happen to be a member. That committee took up and considered the bill, and it then reported to the Senate as its judgment that there should be passed instead of the House bill a substitute which we propose.

If the Senator will be kind enough in his way, always effective, to discuss the Senate substitute and then criticise me for what is in that, I will endeavor to defend it if he will give me an opportunity, either now or at some other time; but I insist, the committee on the part of the Senate having charge of this matter having presented here a substitute for the consideration of the Senate, that he must not at this stage charge us with favoring the House bill. If in conference we shall make modifications, I shall be glad, for one, to have his views upon the conference report.

Mr. BERRY. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The suggestion made by my colleague was that the Senator from Iowa now advocates a provision to pay the United States bonds in gold.

Mr. TELLER. To change the contract.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Arkansas, my colleague, charged, and I understood the Senator from Iowa to deny it——

Mr. BERRY. He denied it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That the Senator's action favored the payment, and proposed by law to make United States bonds payable, in gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. The existing United States bonds.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The existing United States bonds. That is what I say. Now, section 1 of the substitute brought in here by the Senator from Iowa and the majority of the Committee on Finance has a distinct provision, the first words of which are as follows:

> That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value.

It is made the unit, not one of the units. The section referred to, which was adopted in 1873, made gold the single standard, and it stood the single standard until the act of 1878 conferred the same power on silver. The silver dollars were at that time made a standard unit of value just as much as the gold dollar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let me finish what I am saying. Now, when you make one standard, a single standard, you necessarily make all the obligations of the Government payable in that standard. I admit that the words are not here provided as distinctly as in the House bill; you very adroitly undertake to avoid it, but you leave the effect precisely the same as in the House bill. All these obligations are payable in gold if the Senate substitute passes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is it too much trouble for the Senator to point out the provision in the statute of 1878 or any other statute of the United States which makes the silver dollar the standard of value? It is not in the statute and never was.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It makes it full legal tender.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a different proposition.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It gives it unlimited coinage. I submit that any reasonable man on earth knows that a full legal tender must necessarily be a standard of value.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me a moment. Greenbacks are legal tender; Treasury notes are legal tender; national-bank notes are limited legal tender. The legal-tender quality has no more to do with the standard of value than the sunlight has to do with the moonlight. They are very different things. When you come to the question what is the standard of value, if I have time I will endeavor to show later in this debate that this first section of the bill is practically a reiteration of the act of 1873, which has been denounced over and over again in this Chamber as an act that created the single gold standard and which was objected to to such a degree that it has been called the crime of 1873. We have had that rung in our ears in every debate upon the financial question from 1878 down to this time. Therefore, when we have reinserted in this bill in its first section the section which carried into the Revised Statutes the act of 1873 we have not changed the law as respects the standard of value.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Iowa will not take more of my time; that he will not speak longer than I am going to speak myself.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not take more of the Senator's time. I only wanted to correct the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I do not want to give up the floor; I want to speak myself.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I merely wish to say, in reply to the Senator, that the section to which he refers does not make a standard. It does not declare that gold is the standard. It says that the gold dollar shall be the unit of value. It does not say "standard." You bring that in for the first time; and this bill is that much worse than the infamy of 1873.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the crime of 1873 is nothing if that statute did not make gold the standard of value.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I say that it made it the standard of value by making it the unit of value.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to read what the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, said about the act of 1878, which will afford some information to the Senator from Iowa? In his report which he sent to us——

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Colorado think that everybody is bound by the utterances of the late Senator from Ohio? Does he consider himself bound by them in any form or at any time?

Mr. TELLER. This is a contemporaneous exposition of the law, and it is very short.

> The act approved February 28, 1878, made a very important change in our coinage system.
>
> It did change the system somewhat, and that change we do not want to forget was under the leadership of the Senator from Iowa, who was not then so much in love with the act of 1873 as he is to-day.
>
> The silver dollar provided for was made a legal tender for all debts, public or private, except where otherwise stipulated in the contract.
>
> The law itself clearly shows that the silver dollar was not to supersede the gold dollar, nor did Congress propose to adopt the single standard of silver, but only to create a bimetallic standard of silver and gold, of equal value and equal purchasing power.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BERRY. I decline to yield further.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me for one moment?

Mr. BERRY. Very well; I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The statement just read by the Senator as to what constitutes bimetallism would hardly stand the test.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this debate has accomplished one thing. The Senator from Iowa has repudiated the action of his own Republican friends in the House and has said he was not responsible for the Republican party. The Senator from Rhode Island now says that he is not responsible for the greatest leader on finance that the Republican party ever had—John Sherman.

The Senator from Iowa has repudiated all of the Republican members of the House, whom he admits voted to put in this bill, directly and specifically, that the bonds should be payable in gold, and whom he the other day admitted had passed a bill which tied up the greenbacks of this country in the Treasury and could only be paid out for gold. I say that much has been admitted. The Senator from Rhode Island has, as I have said, said he is not responsible for what John Sherman said.

Now, the Senator from Iowa insists that I ought to have discussed the Senate amendment and not the House bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no.

Mr. BERRY. That is the way I certainly understood him.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Arkansas intended to address his observations to me, then he ought to have discussed the Senate amendment and not the House bill. But of course he can discuss either measure by and large, if he chooses.

I hope he will not attribute to me the statement that I admit this, that, or the other as respects the House bill, because I make no admissions upon that subject.

Mr. BERRY. I stated the other day upon the floor of the Senate, and I stated to the Senator from Iowa when he said he differed with the Senator from Colorado about it, the effect of the Senate amendment in tying up the greenbacks of the country. I said the House bill does that, and he said undoubtedly, but not the Senate amendment. I admit it is not in the RECORD in that way, but those are the facts.

Mr. ALLISON. If the RECORD was changed, it was not changed by my instructions.

Mr. BERRY. That is what occurred, to a certainty.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember very well what I stated. I stated that I was not discussing the House bill.

Mr. BERRY. You first stated it, undoubtedly; in the first remark you dropped.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Of course if the Senator seeks to gather from that that I admitted that the House bill does withdraw the greenbacks and the silver, then I wish now to withdraw that statement. I understood that I did withdraw it at the moment.

But my understanding as respects the Senate amendment——

Mr. BERRY. The House bill?

Mr. ALLISON. My understanding in respect to the Senate amendment is that it makes it impossible to do that. I shall be glad to say what I think can be done under the House bill, although it is not important to our debate, as we do not intend to support it.

Mr. BERRY. It seems to me it is important to our debate. It seems to me that the Senator from Iowa assumes that his party here in the Senate and his committee alone are more powerful than all of his party in the House of Representatives. He therefore says it is not important what the House members have done in the passage of this bill, but it is all important as to what the Senate amendment does.

We have had experience enough in the Senate to know what will happen. When the Senate amendment, which will doubtless be adopted by the Republican Senators here, goes into conference, I assert my belief to-day that practically the House bill will become the law. As I said in the beginning of this speech, the Senator from Iowa may be able to get on an amendment something like the character of this first provision of the Senate substitute, which is susceptible of two constructions and which mystifies the situation, to enable the Republicans in Iowa to say that it means one thing and the Republicans in Rhode Island to say that it means another, and yet which the Secretary of the Treasury will, as you know, construe to mean what the Senator from Rhode Island wants it to mean. I say you may do that, but practically, in my opinion, the House bill will be passed.

At any rate, I want the country to understand that a Republican majority, and therein is included every member of the House, has committed itself to this provision which changes the contract from either gold or silver at the option of the Government and makes these bonds payable in gold. You can not avoid it. It has gone to the country. When you bring your conference report here we will discuss that. But we have a right to discuss to-day the House bill, which has passed that body, and to assume that the probabilities are that that will be the law rather than the report of a committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, I think I have said all I intended to say on this bill. I have said that there is not a provision in it except it is for the benefit of those who hold the bonds of the United States and the national banks. I defy any man to point to any provision in the bill which will benefit the laboring classes from one end of the country to the other, or that will bring any kind of relief to the great agricultural classes of the country. You have gone to work to reduce the interest on national banks, to make these bonds, which are now by contract payable in gold or silver, payable in gold alone, to authorize by the House bill the redemption of the silver dollars and greenbacks in gold, and to confer upon your Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue bonds without limit. Those are the provisions of the bill to which you stand committed. It may be that a majority of the people of the United States will sustain you in it, but I do not believe it.

Mr. President, the Republican party of to-day—and you can not escape it, the whole country is beginning to understand it; sooner or later they will understand—has fallen under the influence and control of the combined wealth of the country. It no longer has any sympathy with the agricultural classes. It no longer has any feeling of sympathy for the laboring classes. It is dominated absolutely by the national banks and does the absolute bidding of the boards of trade of the great cities of this country. It is the protector, the defender, the friend, and ally of every corporation, trust, and combination of wealth throughout the country. The agents and representatives of this great wealth and of these manufacturing associations continue to grow bolder and bolder and more exorbitant in their demands as you yield to them.

They appear before committees of the Senate no longer asking, but demanding legislation for their special benefit. They not only demand the passage of this bill, which gives the national banks the control of the finances of the Government, but, under the false pretense of increasing commerce, they also demand that millions of dollars shall be taken annually from money belonging to all the people and given to the great corporations which control the transportation of products to and from foreign ports. They are not satisfied alone with this financial legislation, but they come here—and your President has recommended that it be given to them—asking that millions of dollars be taken out of the Treasury, which belongs to all the people, and paid over to the men who are already immensely rich and have this great shipping business which carries a portion of our foreign trade. Not only this, but this Administration is gradually yielding to their demands, sometimes feebly protesting, it is true, but in the end doing what these classes and associations of wealth and the trusts have requested.

The Republican party has step by step and year by year advanced toward imperialism and absolute power. It has now reached the point when its leaders scarcely pretend any sympathy with a government of the people and by the people and for the people. Not only that, but many of its wealthy and leading advocates in the Eastern cities, men who furnish largely the money to run your campaign, are beginning boldly to proclaim that the English system of government is superior to ours, and that the republican form is no longer suited to our people; and every attempt that is made here to legislate or speak on behalf of the laboring classes and the agricultural classes is met with a sneer and the charge of demagogy; and yet when one of the representatives of these corporations comes to the committee you yield to his demand and pass such laws as he asks. I know this is strong language, but it is the truth, and every man about the Senate sees it day by day as these great, wealthy, corporate representatives appear here before the committees of this body.

In addition, as I have said, many of them no longer pretend to regard our form of government, and the Administration itself has shown that it has become the follower and the imitator of English methods and the English Government, and to-day, Mr. President, while four-fifths of the people of this country are in sympathy with those who in southern Africa are struggling for liberty and for freedom, we have every reason to believe that this Republican Administration is in sympathy with a monarchy that attempts to crush these Republics. I say that that condition has come about because you have from time to time yielded to these wealthy classes and have forgotten those who have to struggle for themselves.

I do not know whether or not the American people who believe in bimetallism, who are opposed to government by trusts and corporations, who are opposed to imperialism, who believe in equality of citizens before the law, can unite to overthrow the party which threatens the destruction of the Republic. I know that if we could unite all the elements who are opposed to the present Administration, if we could rally them under one banner, success would be certain. I do not know, but I hope and believe that when this bill, so absolutely unjust to the great body of the people of this country, so clearly dictated by the national banks and by men who hold the wealth, goes forth it will arouse such a storm of indignation throughout the Western States and disclose the evils under which the country is laboring from this Government as to enable us to send to Congress representatives who will remedy it and bring back, if possible, a government of the people, as those who wrote the Declaration of Independence and framed the Constitution intended.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I understand the question before the Senate now is the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill which was sent here and insert an entire amendment proposed by the Senate Finance Committee. I propose an amendment to the amendment, accepting the proposition to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

First. That it is the fixed policy of the United States to pay and clear off the national debt as rapidly as just and equal taxation and the accumulation of other revenues of the Government will permit, with constant regard to the capacity of the people to respond to this national duty.

Second. That the specie basis, consisting of gold or silver coin, or both, is the only true, just, and constitutional basis of the issue of bank bills to circulate as money.

Third. That it is an unjust and unconstitutional burden on the taxpayers of the United States that Congress should agree to change the terms of the national obligations with the consent of the bondholders, so as to deprive the people of the right and privilege of paying said obligations in coins of gold or silver according to their necessities or the requirements of the general welfare.

Fourth. That it is contrary to the policy of the United States that the national debt shall be made perpetual or that it should be maintained or increased for the benefit of the national banks or to regulate the commercial value of gold or silver bullion.

I offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the amendment may be read at the desk. I was not able to catch the first part of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Senator from Rhode Island asks to have the amendment of the Senator from Alabama read at the desk. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any extended discussion of the bill now before the Senate, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], a member of the Committee on Finance, the other day criticised my construction of this bill; and as I see he is now present, with other members of the committee, I wish to say just a few words, so that when the Senator makes the speech he has told us he is going to make he will give us the benefit of a few points in it that I want to suggest.

I want the Senator, when he makes his next speech, to tell us, and I think we are entitled to know, why the Republicans of this body found fault with the House bill, the history of which, of course, I need not repeat, as I stated it the other day. Everybody knows that that is the bill prepared at Indianapolis, brought here, and submitted to a committee of Republicans elected by the Republican caucus of the last Congress, who were to consider this matter and present to the House a bill. The committee appointed by the caucus sat for some time, with the present Speaker at their head, and they reported to the House this bill. They reported it first to a House caucus composed of the Republican members of the House, now in a large majority. While I can not say what occurred in that caucus, while I am not acquainted with all that occurred, the public press said there was some division at first as to the propriety of the bill, but it was ultimately accepted as the measure of the party.

Now, this is the bill that the President gave his support to on the 24th of July, 1897, when he sent his message here and called our attention to the plan that the wise men at Indianapolis had suggested. That is the time he told us that patriotic people had met there and spent two days, out of which they had brought a scheme which he said he especially referred us for consideration, giving it at least his approval in that way. He did not say in so many words that he approved it, but if I call the attention of one of my colleagues to a proposition, and say that it is worthy of his attention, it at least indicates that I am somewhat in accord. This is the bill.

Now, where is the vice in that bill, which the Republicans of the Senate could not take? We are entitled to know that. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island never said a word about the House bill. There was absolute silence on his part about that measure. Of course we had a right to assume that he did not approve of it, because he did not agree to it as a member of the Finance Committee. The other members of the committee must have disagreed to it, because this substitute for it is the action, I understand, of the Republican members of that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the action of a majority.

Mr. TELLER. Of a majority of the Republican members of the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. No; of a majority of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Of a majority of the committee, certainly. Of course I did not mean to say that it was accepted by all the members of the committee, but it appears to have been accepted by all the Republicans, so far as I know.

Now, Mr. President, it is a very great thing and a very serious thing to change your financial system, and I suppose nobody will deny but that here is proposed a very radical and material change of the financial system.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. TELLER. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether he is speaking now of the Senate amendment or the House bill?

Mr. TELLER. I am talking about both of them.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator seems to think we ought to give the reasons why we prefer to the House bill the Senate amendment. He said this is a radical change in our financial system. Does he mean that the Senate amendment is a radical change?

Mr. TELLER. I mean both of them. Either one that becomes a law will be a radical change. I have no doubt, as was stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], that neither of them will become a law in their absolute entirety as they were introduced or came from the House. There will be some combination of provisions, I have no doubt. It can hardly be expected to be otherwise.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat, I think we are entitled to know why the Senate committee discarded the House bill. We assail that measure. We say it is a dangerous bill, a wicked bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of what bill is the Senator speaking as a wicked bill?

Mr. TELLER. I am talking about the House bill; and that bill is as much here as the Senate bill, and the Senators can not escape it. What is more, it comes here with the imprint of the Republican party as a party. It is their bill; it is their policy, Mr. President.

I was told the other day that there had been no caucus on this subject in the Senate and that therefore the Senate amendment is simply the idea of the Republican members of the committee. It is possible that they consulted their associates, but I have no reason to suppose they did from the celerity with which they brought it out of committee after it went from this body to the committee.

So, Mr. President, we are authorized to say that the House bill represents the policy of the Republican party. And I want to say here now that the Republican press of this country is for the House bill. The Post in this city said the other morning that the influential Republican press of the country is for the House bill. I say that the Republican press of the country is for the House bill. The Republican writers who are writing on the subject are writing in favor of the House bill. I have here a statement made by Mr. M. L. Muhleman, the assistant treasurer in New York, who is authority on these questions. This appeared in Sound Money a day or two ago:

The outlook is for a measure composed of parts of both bills, with some new matter evolved by a conference committee of the two Houses.

What iniquity they may fix up and put in with these other iniquities none of us can now tell. We shall have to wait until the conference report gets here to properly meet that.

Altogether the House bill contains more of the elements requisite to constitute a well-rounded law to meet the present conditions; amendments are desirable, as has been indicated.

He wanted some few amendments.

Upon four points there appears already an agreement: The enactment of the gold standard, the maintenance of parity, the policy of not reissuing redeemed legal-tender notes except for gold—

Now, mind, that is the interpretation of your amendment—the Senate amendment. That is one of the things the Senator from Iowa was criticising me for the other day, although he did not specify it—the policy of not reissuing redeemed legal-tender notes except for gold, and allowing national banks to issue notes to the par of bonds deposited. This may therefore be regarded as the minimum legislation that we may expect; no doubt a considerable step forward.

While we may thus expect a solution of one branch of our monetary problem, there still remains the other—the paper-money branch—to be solved.

I said the other day that when this bill became a law, as it would, we would hear a call for proper legislation upon the bank question; and these folks can not wait. If the Senate provision should happen to become a law, they will immediately attack Congress for a wise provision, which I suppose will follow after the suggestion made perhaps by the Secretary of the Treasury that the proper system of issuing money is to issue it on your debts. Why, Mr. President, I could get rich if I could do that, and so could some of my constituents and many others of my acquaintance. But what I want to call attention to is that these people are starting in early—the paper-money branch—to be solved; for no one will seriously claim that the proposed legislation on these lines is adequate to the country's needs.

I want the Senator from Iowa to tell me when he makes his speech whether he agrees with that, and whether this is to be followed by a new national-bank law. If he can possibly do so, I wish him to outline what it is. It may be that it might somewhat mitigate my grief at seeing this bill pass if he could suggest a good bank bill.

What may be regarded as secured is that the national banks may increase their circulation by 10 per cent, and they would also have an opportunity to expand further if there were not obstacles in the way—

Well, those obstacles will be removed by giving some privileges that they do not have under existing law—

but so long as we have our $800,000,000 of Government notes—

Now, this is what I want to call attention to, and I want the Senator from Iowa to address himself to this point—but so long as we have our $800,000,000 of Government notes and silver certificates there is no room for a material increase in bank circulation. We must, however, not look for more radical legislation this year. This must wait the determination of the political struggle of 1900.

The article is signed by M. L. Muhleman, who is the assistant treasurer in New York. Mr. President, according to my interpretation, that is a declaration from very high authority that we are to have further legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not official.

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose he signed it as assistant treasurer, but then he is high in the councils of our gold-standard friends at least. The Senator from Iowa asks me what I want him to explain. I should like to have him explain these particular points.

Mr. ALDRICH. As much as he can.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, as much as he can.

I said the other day, and I say again, this gold standard is not to stop with this bill.

Mr. President, you can not maintain this gold standard under present conditions and present law, and in self-defense, if it is to be maintained at all, you have got to make some changes. I do not know what they will be, nor do I know what they ought to be; but I am not concerned in that. I am not responsible for the gold standard. I said the other day it had been a curse to every nation that had ever tried it, and so it has, Mr. President. If it had not been for the accidental discovery of gold in California and Australia in 1848 the gold standard would have wrecked the Kingdom of Great Britain, in my judgment. It has practically brought misfortune and distress to every country in the world that has tried it. And to-day there are no countries that have made it a success without a sacrifice, and the benefits are not equal to the sacrifice they have made. Robert Giffen, the gold-standard advocate, as I said the other day, declared that it had been made a success nowhere in modern times.

Now, I wish the Senator to tell me, if he can, what is to follow this measure, if anything. Are we to have a banking system that shall turn over to the banks the sole authority to issue paper money, as indicated by this writer where he speaks of the danger to this system of $800,000,000 of paper money, Government money? I agree, Mr. President, that $800,000,000 of paper money is a danger to a gold standard. You have more than $800,000,000, because you have two hundred and some odd million dollars of bank paper besides. Every government that has tried it has found itself compelled either to restrict its paper money or else to defer the gold standard. Great Britain tried it in 1816. She did not get to the gold standard until 1823. From time to time she extended the time to put it in force. She curtailed her paper money in order that she might get there. She brought more distress from 1815 to 1823 upon that country than all the Napoleonic wars had brought upon it, and the great debt that had been put upon that country by the tremendous struggle she made to down Napoleon and to maintain her supremacy was nothing compared to the shrinkages of values, and the suffering of her people by hunger and poverty was infinitely greater than it had been by the desolations of war.

I want the Senators who are in favor of this to tell us what benefit we are to get from this gold standard and why the law of compensation that has touched every nation that has tried it is not likely to reach us. It can only be done, I say, by an entire change of the system of currency of this country, by an abandonment of the function on the part of the Government of the United States to make its money. If we are to turn over to the banks of this country that governmental function that was never until recent years intrusted to corporations or to individuals, I want them to tell me how it is that the bankers of this country can do that which we can not do with all the great wealth and strength of 75,000,000 people back of us.

The proposition, on the one hand, is that those bonds which are to be reissued, of which I want to speak in a few minutes, are to be the basis of banking, and as they issue currency these national notes must disappear. The House plan is that they shall disappear to a large extent by being impounded in the Treasury, and nobody can deny it. I believe the Senate bill does to a degree what the House bill does to a larger degree, and that is all the difference.

Mr. President, we have had some experience with banks in this country. We had a bank once called a national bank, and it was not a bank with very big capital nor very big deposits compared with the present time, for, of course, it was a time when the country was new and young. But, Mr. President, if it had not been that there was a Jackson in the Presidential chair to take that bank by the throat and compel it to go into liquidation we would have had a condition that had never prevailed in this country and could not have prevailed except by the domination of the money power aggregated in a great bank.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know he wants to treat the subject fairly, as he has always treated it in the Senate. I should like to ask him whether, in his opinion, any increase in national-bank notes after the passage of this bill will drive out of circulation either the United States notes or the silver certificates, when you take into consideration the provision which we propose in regard to the denominations of the notes to be issued?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I believe it will.

Mr. ALDRICH. In what way?

Mr. TELLER. I believe, in the first place, there will come a demand from these banks that we take out of circulation national paper money—greenbacks, silver certificates, etc.

Mr. ALDRICH. I supposed the Senator meant from natural causes and not from legislation. Of course we could reduce the amount by legislation.

Mr. TELLER. I will talk about that. I had not intended to do so, but I am willing to go into it if I do not take too much time. However, I did not get up to make a speech in extenso. As I have shown here, there is an indication already that they are going to demand that we shall make a way for the banks to issue bills, claiming that that field belongs to the national banks.

The Senator's amendment provides for a refunding of the debt, an absolutely unnecessary thing at this time. Why, Mr. President, there is no need of our retiring bonds seven or eight years before they are due, unless we receive some special benefit in return (and that benefit can not be obtained by a slight reduction of interest), and then putting upon the country a system of finance by which the banks of this country shall determine when and how money shall issue, whether it shall be plenty, or whether it shall be scarce.

Mr. President, the prerogative to issue money is the dearest prerogative that a nation ever owned. It had been for hundreds of years, and, I believe, thousands of years, a prerogative of nationality. When one king went off the throne and a new king came on, all over the world for hundreds of years, he immediately coined some money and sent it out to show that he was the sovereign, because only a sovereign could coin money.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is discussing the prerogative of the Government, and intimating that he believes the Government ought to issue all money. I should like to ask him if he considers that the present existing money in circulation is sufficient for existing demands and for prospective demands in the future, and if he believes there ought to be an increased amount of money in circulation over that now used?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know about that, and that is a matter which perhaps I shall not be able to fully determine just now.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me it is directly pertinent to the line of argument the Senator is pursuing.

Mr. TELLER. There has not been a sufficient amount of money in circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there has not been, is there now? And if there is not now, how will the deficiency be taken care of or provided for?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell you how it can be taken care of—open your mints.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well.

Mr. TELLER. Open your mints to silver and you will get all the money you want.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there is no demand for increased circulation, there is no need of opening the mints.

Mr. TELLER. If there is not any demand, nobody will go to the mints with his bullion.

Mr. ALDRICH. He will if he gets 100 cents for 50 cents' worth.

Mr. TELLER. He does not get $1 for 50 cents.

Mr. ALDRICH. He would be very likely to, I think.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to go into that question; for any sensible man in the Senate of the United States or elsewhere must know that it is nonsense to talk about a man obtaining 100 cents for 50 cents' worth of bullion when the mints are open to coin it into American money. Do you suppose the American people are fools?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not.

Mr. TELLER. Do you suppose the American who has an ounce of silver is going to sell it for 50 cents an ounce when he can get it coined into American money at $1.29. It is so absurd, Mr. President, that it is beneath, I think, the dignity of this Senate to consider such a proposition.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator will admit that that would be the first result.

Mr. TELLER. What would be the first result?

Mr. ALDRICH. I mean the first result if the free coinage of silver should be adopted.

Mr. TELLER. If you should adopt the free coinage of silver, the man who now owns 50 cents' worth of silver would get the benefit of the increased price. Nobody denies that. What would that amount to? There is not in the world to-day $5,000,000 of silver bullion, and there would be, if free coinage should be adopted, a rise from 50 cents to $1.29; but should a great financial system be determined on that little piddling notion that somebody is going to make money out of it? Why, Mr. President, I can say, as a Frenchman, speaking of the condition existing in France in 1858, said, when there were coming great quantities of gold, when gold was at a discount, and when it was being discredited by nearly all the world. He said France stood there, and said, "Bring your gold and we will put it into money—French money, good money; bring your silver and we will put it into money—French money, good money—money good throughout the world."

Mr. President, the American dollar wherever it goes is an American dollar, and you can make it good in every part of the world as an American dollar. Do you suppose that men who own bullion will take it to a bullion broker and sell it for 50 cents on the dollar when they can go to a mint and have it manufactured into money at twice that sum; and what harm will there be if that is the "trouble," as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said?

The objection the Senator makes to free coinage is that silver bullion is worth only 60 cents on the dollar. If it was worth $1.29, we would be willing to open our mints to it; and when we show you that if we would open the mints it would be worth the mint's price, then you say that is the "trouble;" somebody who ought not to have it will get some money out of this. With free coinage the silver miner of the world, who toils as few men toil, will get increased compensation for his labor and mankind will secure a blessing in the increased supply of the money metal. Discredit it, destroy it, for fear some bullion holder may make something on the rise of silver, if it rises.

The only metal that has done money duty through all times and through all climes is the white metal. It is to-day the money of more than two-thirds of the race. It has touched more blistered hands and has stimulated more progress in the world than all the gold from the day when gold was first mined to the present hour; and what will be the harm? I do not, however, intend to be led off from this bill. I want to speak of the practical result of this legislation.

Mr. President, I know that prophecies are of little account; but I prophesied on this floor in 1893 that the time would not be far distant when Senators here who were then proclaiming themselves bimetallists would be lending themselves to the establishment of the gold standard, when a demand would come for the destruction of the paper money and the turning over to the banks of this country of that prerogative of sovereignty, the making of money.

I want to say before I conclude what I intended to say when I was diverted by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who has a faculty, when he thinks he is likely to be damaged by something somebody may say, to immediately intervene—not that I could say anything which would particularly damage anybody, but I can tell the truth, and that is what the Senator does not want to have on this question. [Laughter.]

We saw in 1893 a panic in this country created by the banks, and so designated by our best people, gold men and silver men alike. It was the object lesson which the President of the United States declared the American people had to receive in order that he might secure the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. Thousands and tens of thousands of men went down from affluence to poverty by reason of that wicked act.

The banks lent themselves to it and encouraged it, and when affairs reached such a condition that they could not meet their demands, in the great city of New York the banks surrendered and suspended payments for more than three months, during which time no man could go to his bank and draw more than the amount of money the bank thought he ought to have. The law required the banks to pay on demand or to go into liquidation. But they did not pay, nor did they go into liquidation, and their creditors had no remedy but to wait. We have had another panic. The Secretary of the Treasury says it was "a threatened severe panic." Mr. President, it was not only a threatened, but it was a severe panic. A newspaper in the city of New York, and not a silver paper either, declared that the shrinkage of stock in a few days amounted to $700,000,000, and said that that was a loss to the public. I do not believe that. The stocks were in reality worth just as much as they had been before, but a change of conditions of that kind, which can be brought about by the influence of banks, is destructive of good government and also destructive of good commercial conditions.

I cut out of a Philadelphia newspaper a statement—I have not examined to see whether it is correct or not, but I have no doubt it is, for it has the air of being correct—what is reported to be a letter from a bank president. I find in the paper that the president of the National City Bank of New York, of which you have heard something, on the 8th day of April last addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the financial condition in the city of New York. I want to call the attention of the Senate to this most remarkable statement, and I want to say that it is what is going on all the time, in my judgment, with these great banks.

I have been informed by those who know that 75 per cent of all the loans made in New York City by those banks are made to speculators and to operators, and that it is a very common thing for the banks themselves to engage in such operations. If they do not do so, their officers do. The letter to which I refer was written to Secretary Gage by Mr. Stillman, president of the bank, Mr. Hepburn being the vice-president. It reads:

As you have doubtless noticed in the press, the money market here has been quite unsettled during the latter part of the week.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What is date of that letter?

Mr. TELLER. April 8, 1899.

We have loaned very liberally—

I think they could. I think at that time they had about $10,000,000 of United States money in that bank. They had had $20,000,000, and they had paid out, I think, $10,000,000 of it; but at that time I believe they had still $10,000,000, although I would not state that positively. That, however, is about the amount.

As you have doubtless noticed in the press, the money market here has been quite unsettled during the latter part of the week. We have loaned very liberally in order to allay apprehension, but at such rates as would tend to force a liquidation in highly speculative securities. I think this has been accomplished, and the declines which have taken place will have a wholesome effect.

Mr. President, when did it become the province of a bank, in any system of finance ever known amongst honest men, to deal with the market to make things high or to make things low? How can any man do business either in his store or in his manufactory if the banks can thus deal with the finances of the country?

We have loaned very liberally—

But all the time keeping in view that they wanted to do a certain thing—but at such rates as would tend to force a liquidation in highly speculative securities. I think this has been accomplished, and the declines which have taken place will have a wholesome effect.

I have here a statement showing some of the declines in the prices of stocks. I am not saying that there is a loss when a stock goes from 105 to 75. The stock is worth just as much as it was before, but there are in fact a number of men who own these stocks who go to a bank and borrow money upon them, not perhaps to speculate with, but for other purposes. That is true not only in New York, but all over the United States. A man owning a share of Rock Island stock, or a number of shares, can go into the city of Chicago or into any Western city and borrow money on that stock, putting it up as security for the amount borrowed. Let us see what happened.

Sugar stock, common, was 176¼, and it fell to 149¼, or $27.25 a share. Any man using that stock as security for a loan would be called upon to make his loan good, and if he was not able to do so, the stock would be sold at this reduced rate. Who would buy it? It was easy for those great banks to combine in this way, thus making money for the time being very dear, buy the stock at low rates, and then by making money plentiful again put up prices, and then sell the stock.

I shall give a few more of these quotations: Brooklyn Rapid Transit, a perfectly legitimate stock—I do not know whether the sugar stock is or not—dropped from 136 to 106½, a fall of $29.50 a share; Consolidated Gas dropped from 205½ to 190—that is, $14.50 a share; People's Gas from 129½ to 111¼—that is, $18 a share; Metropolitan Street Railway dropped from 267 to 234—that is, $33 a share; Federal Steel, common, fell $17.50 a share; Federal Steel, preferred, fell $15.25 a share; New York Central Railroad—a class of securities which have been considered equal to Government bonds—fell $8.25 a share; and Chicago and Rock Island, one of the gilt-edged securities of the West, fell $5.12½ a share.

There has been rarely at any time such a condition of the market as that. Here is the declaration of one of the great banks of the city of New York that they had been making liberal loans for the purpose of beating down the price of these stocks. I do not suppose they intended to beat down the price of New York Central nor of the Pennsylvania Central, but they beat down the whole line of stocks from the city of New York to the city of San Francisco; yet Senators want to put that great power—not for good, but for evil—in the control of the banks of this country, and to abdicate the power of the General Government to issue money of any kind.

I want to know when this bill finally passes whether it will have any such provisions in it as the House bill contains, which enable the banks to take possession of the money of the country. If it does not, I want to know whether it is to be followed, as the indications are from the letter which I have read, by further legislation next year, when you have succeeded, as you may possibly succeed, in getting once more into power. Have you deferred such action to this time because you did not dare to take the position plainly and boldly and honestly before the American people, did not dare to take the position which the Secretary of the Treasury is contending for, did not dare to take the position which the great press of your party is contending for, that the Government must go out of the banking business, and that the banks must be left to furnish us the currency that is to be circulated in this country?

Mr. President, if I could furnish the currency for 75,000,000 people, I would not care to accept as a gift all the great gold mines of the world, for such a privilege would be better even than such a gift.

That is what this bill means. I want the two Senators who sit here [Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. ALLISON], who are so closely connected with this bill, to tell me, when they come to speak upon it, whether I have not made a fair statement of the provisions, at least, of the House bill as it comes here.

Mr. President, something was said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] about a change of the contract with the bondholders. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said there was no change of contract. He admitted there was such a change in the House bill, but said that there was not in the Senate substitute. However that may be, this is certainly a Republican measure; but, leaving that, suppose Republican Senators have the power to upset and overturn the caucus determination and substitute something else, have you, too, not proposed a change in the contract? What do you propose? Your bill says that every man who has a bond due in eight years from now may take it to the Treasury and exchange it for a bond due in thirty years from this time, with a gold clause in it. The bond contains no gold clause now.

Mr. ALDRICH. "May."

Mr. TELLER. "May;" but that practically means that he will do so. There is no limit as to when it may be done. I will tell the Senator what will be done. Such of the bondholders as desire will make an immediate exchange. Those who do not do that will continue to hold their bonds until the time for their payment has nearly expired, and then they will make the exchange. They will not surrender the interest unless they think they can secure a greater profit in using the next bonds as the basis of national banks than they can see in holding on to the old bonds.

What authority has Congress to change this contract? In 1870 we provided by law what the bond should contain. There could be no bonds issued for which Congress did not provide, and Congress stipulated what the bonds should contain; that they should contain a provision that they were to be payable in coin, reserving to the United States the privilege, which has been found of inestimable value everywhere in the world, to have the right to pay in the one metal or the other as should be most convenient. Has any bondholder suffered detriment by that provision? It is true the time may not have come when there is any necessity for the Government to exercise its option, but it does not follow that such a time may not come. The provision was put in the law ex industria; it was put there because it was thought to be valuable to us; and we are now surrendering it without any equivalent whatever. What crisis has come, what conditions exist which justify us in changing the contract?

Mr. President, who made these bonds? Not Congress, not the Executive, but the American people. What has given them their value? It has been the fact that the American people were back of them. They would not be worth as much as Continental or Confederate money if the world did not know that the great American nation was back of them. The people are the makers of these bonds. They said to Congress, "You make a bond of that character." They may change it, though they have not indicated to this body or to the other that they wanted to change it. No emergency exists why it should be changed. Oh, Mr. President, it is thought if you will change it now and make it attractive by the length of time the bond will have to run and give these people a chance to issue the money of the country on the bonds, that they will take them up, and you will get rid of this troublesome question of finance, which has vexed our people, I will admit, for some years.

The American people have a right to insist that those bonds shall remain until it is time to exchange them for others; and then, if the party in power choose to take the responsibility, let it do it. You received no instructions at the last election to do this thing. You went before the American people with the pretense that you were for bimetallism. A distinguished man of your party, whom I quoted the other day, said in another place—and I have no objection to speaking of it, because it was in the last Congress—that a hundred members would sit in the present House who would owe their seats to that bimetallic provision. You have not received any demand from the American people to change the contract, but you are doing it at the bidding of men who have no right to demand of you or of me anything at all.

I want you, when you come to make those speeches that you are going to make, to meet these questions and to tell us whether your bill is intended to do the things which I say it is intended to do, or whether it is not, and if it is, why you propose to do it.

In the Senate amendment you impound the greenbacks and Treasury notes. You provide two or three ways in which the exchange shall be made; but for fear I may misquote I will read the language of the bill. After providing for this fund it provides that it shall be maintained in the following manner:

> First, by exchanging the notes so redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the United States notes so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes in accordance with the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That is for buying gold. When that is done, if they have got the exchange, that is the end of it.

By the way, that section also authorizes the issue of bonds; and under that, as I said the other day, Mr. Cleveland issued his bonds. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether or not he and his colleagues intend, by the words used here, to give the same authority, under this proposed law, to issue bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. That only applies to gold received in exchange for notes.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I supposed. The provision for the issue of bonds is this:

> If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods.

And so forth.

Having failed in all those, he having said he could not do it, then he may issue bonds.

Mr. SPOONER. He could not say he could not do it until he had tried by the methods indicated and failed.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether he could or not. There is a great deal of liberty given him.

Mr. SPOONER. I mean he could not properly say it.

Mr. TELLER. He could not properly say it; but suppose he did, suppose he should say, "I can not get gold in this way," and he should then issue bonds. I do not think the people could repudiate the bonds. So it is a matter left, after all, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and when he sees fit to issue bonds, as I said the other day, he may put them out, and they are to be a burden upon us.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I say, under the law it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to exhaust the other means before resorting to the issue of bonds. It is to be presumed that he will obey the plain requirements of law.

Mr. TELLER. That ought to be the presumption; that is the presumption, I will agree; but we saw a Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, undoubtedly, making contracts with private parties for the sale of bonds at a figure which everybody knew was ruinous, or would have been ruinous to the credit of any individual, though it was not ruinous to the national credit.

I heard on this floor a statement which I remember, coming from a Senator who sat over here, that the Government of the United States in its dire extremity had been compelled to appeal to the bankers of New York City, and when I said, or when somebody here said, that the Secretary could have sold those bonds in Europe at a higher figure, it was said that the Government had kept the cable wires hot in its efforts to secure bidders for those bonds in Europe. I stated then, and I state now, that no such offer was made, and when the opportunity came for Europe to take those bonds they were taken at 12½ per cent above what the Government got for them.

Mr. COCKRELL. And more than that.

Mr. TELLER. We do not want any discretion left with the Secretary of the Treasury by which he may increase the national debt at will.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, there were no such provisions of law as those inserted in this bill. He had discretion then. Under this bill he is given none.

Mr. TELLER. The Secretary of the Treasury exercised his discretion in issuing the bonds. It was discretionary with him to say at what price he would issue them. That is what I am talking about. He abused his discretion when he sold for less than the value.

There is where he abused the discretion, Mr. President, and so it is not safe to leave matters to the discretion of an Executive Department of the Government. What you want to do is to tie up the Executive by law. I did not get up to say a tenth part of what I have said.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado be kind enough to say what discretion is left to the Secretary of the Treasury under the language which he has just read?

Mr. TELLER. I will read it, if the Senator desires.

Mr. SPOONER. I am only asking the Senator's opinion about it.

Mr. TELLER. I think there is large discretion left to him. I can put some constructions upon this proposed law which I can not conceive that the committee could have desired, and therefore I am going to wait until I hear from them a little more fully upon the subject.

There is a provision here that whenever this money runs down in amount, whenever it shall fall below $100,000,000, then this effort shall be made.

Mr. SPOONER. Shall be made?

Mr. TELLER. Shall be made. He has no discretion about that. Although he might be satisfied that there would be no trouble about it, there is a hundred million dollars always dedicated to absolute nonmoney use.

Mr. SPOONER. We do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. We do that now.

Mr. TELLER. We do not do that, because there is no law authorizing it. We do not do it.

Mr. SPOONER. Under the bill, I mean.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, you do. We have a system of putting aside a hundred million dollars for the redemption of greenbacks, but it went down to $42,000,000 once, under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, you will remember, and the country did not come to any considerable trouble by it that I know of.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the country did.

Mr. TELLER. No, it did not. The large demand upon the Government for gold in exchange for greenbacks was made after the call was made for the bonds. That is a fact which the Senator can look up and find to be true. A large amount of the money came right out of the Treasury and went back into the Treasury again for those bonds.

Mr. President, I am somewhat afraid of bonds. I had hoped at one time in my life to see the Government out of debt. I know now, unless I should live to an age to which I have not any possible hope or expectation of living, or any other man now living, that we will not be out of debt. But can we not call a halt on it? Can we not stop where we are? Is there anything in the gold-standard system that will justify us in increasing the national debt in order to maintain it? If it can not be maintained without that, is it a desirable system for us? I wish the Senators would answer all those questions.

Those questions disturb me. I do not want to discuss them upon any political lines. I have great interest in the American people. I believe myself in their good sense and all that, but I see insidiously a system being imposed upon them which it seems to me will be very destructive of their best interests, and I feel it my duty to protest. I protested just as vigorously when I was a member of the Republican party against some of the policies of that party as I am doing to-day.

I do not believe you can ruin the entire nation; and I am pretty confident that some day the American common sense will reassert itself, and party prejudice and party passion and the influence of wealth will not be able to continue a system which seems to me to be detrimental to the best interests of the people of this country. I have an abiding hope; but, as a distinguished economist in Europe said, "It is not a question whether silver will be rehabilitated; it is only a question how much suffering Europe will sustain before she does it." It is not a question but that some day the American people will establish a righteous and just system of finance; but it is a question how much suffering, how many people will be wiped out financially in doing that which can help, at most, only a trifling percentage of the American people, and that will inflict injury on very many.

That is the reason why I approach this question with some earnestness and with some anxiety. I agree that times have improved. I believe it is said that iron has gone up 37 per cent in a year and a half, or less than two years, and that many other articles have gone up; but I notice with extreme solicitude that the men who toil on the farm are getting less to-day for their crops than they got last year. I notice that the men who form the basis of all good society—the agriculturists—are getting no benefit whatever out of this so-called boom.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to say that all the iron goods used extensively by the farmers and everything else the farmer consumes have gone up from 35 to as high as 200 per cent, while the price of their crops has not increased?

Mr. TELLER. I was coming to that point. A system of prosperity which touches only a few or even a considerable number of people and leaves out the great substratum of society, the class upon which the hopes of the Republic must always depend, the American farmers, is a vicious one and that prosperity is a delusion. As the Senator from Nebraska said, and as I was going to say, everything that the farmer buys has gone up anywhere from 15 to 37 per cent, and, as he says, on some trust articles even more. His expenses are greater and his income less. There is a fault in this prosperity of yours. It is not here.

Mr. President, the people of the United States are more interested in this bill than in any other. I believe I heard somebody say that the question of our relations with foreign countries is the great question. I do not believe it. I believe that the thing which touches the interest of 75,000,000 people as the money question touches them is the great interest. Nobody ought to have more interest in the men who toil than the Republicans in this Chamber or the Republican party. They have been the backbone and support of the Republican party since it carried its first banner, and yet, as said by the Senator from Arkansas, there is not any hope for them in this bill.

I hope Senators will tell us when they get the floor how this is to help the American laborer, how it is to help the man who tills a few acres. Tell us whether it is to give him greater ability to take care of his family, to fit them for the great duties of American citizenship. It will not do for you to say that it gives us more stable money, which is one of the fallacies of your class of men now. You have had stable money for the last twenty years. You have had it with silver, and the history of the world will bear me out in the statement that the stability of money based upon the two metals has always been greater than when based upon one.

The other day I was looking over the Economic History of Athens, by Mr. Boechk, and he again and again states that silver was found to be the stable money in ancient times and that the value of gold was determined by silver and not silver by gold. You discard one of the money metals, and you make money dear, and you put up prices by combinations, and then you call it prosperity. That is infinitely worse than he who, having swept the land of people and property, created a solitude and called it peace. This bill brings no comfort and no hope to the student of finance. It brings no hope to the men who know what the history of the world's money has been; no hope to the men who have kept in touch with the affairs of the last twenty years and have seen great countries like Germany and Austria and Russia struggling with this question and practically failing.

It brings no hope to the men who know that it took the great power of England, with no other country struggling for gold, from 1816 to 1823 to make her gold standard a success, a condition which Lord Baring described when he declared before the committee of 1832 that silver had always been the stable money of the world and was then, and that gold was not, and when he said, "We were compelled to ransack every corner to find gold to carry out this system." A Mr. O'Connell said in Parliament, "I can conceive no purpose in the passage of this bill save and except an experiment to see how much human nature can endure. We have had the trial," he said, "here since 1816," and he made that speech in 1835. If any country has prospered, and all its people have prospered, under the gold standard, let the Senators tell us where and what country it is.

Mr. President, I am not going into ancient history, but the man who does not read these things and does not take the truth home to him is not fit to legislate in this Chamber. There is a great purpose to be served by this bill, and the first object is to establish the gold standard, to put the country upon one metal absolutely. With it will come a demand that the silver money shall disappear, and under this bill, if it becomes a law, no man can stand on this floor and give any reason why the Government should not sell the $500,000,000 in silver we have now. They are to be remitted to the category of representative money. Their influence is no longer to be felt in determining values. They are no longer to have the commercial influence that they have been having as primary money. You might as well supply their place with paper money as to leave them there as the simple representative of money to be exchanged for what under the proposed law you make the only money of this country.

Mr. President, there are some other matters in connection with this bill, but I will reserve them until after I have heard the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and, I trust, other Senators on the Committee on Finance. I do not ask in any sense that they shall do what is unusual or improper, but I do say here that in the history of the world there has been but one exception like this, and that was in 1873, when we changed our financial system without the knowledge of any man who voted for the bill and certainly without the knowledge of the man who signed it. I undertake to say that in the long line of the history of financial transactions the friends of the measure proposed have always given it some defense, and here it has had practically none.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, before this measure is voted upon I intend to state my objections to the first ten lines of the substitute establishing the gold standard, and I only rise now to ascertain what is contained in the rest of the bill, as the committee understand it. The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] I understood to say that the Senate substitute contained a declaration that all the bonds of the United States now payable in gold or silver coin at the option of the Government are made payable in gold alone. If I am not mistaken, I heard him make that statement while the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] was speaking.

Mr. President, I have carefully examined the bill substitute, and I do not find any such enactment therein contained. It certainly was contained in the House bill. The junior Senator from Arkansas was right in his statement as to the bill which came from the House. I wish to read the clause in order that it may be seen how broad it was.

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations—

Mark how broad the language is—public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

There was an absolute declaration, Mr. President, in favor of the gold standard and the payment in gold of obligations not only of the United States, but of every private obligation throughout the length and breadth of the land. That, to my mind, as Senators well know, is a very objectionable enactment, and if it were to be found in the Senate substitute it would be an additional reason why I could not vote for it, besides the provisions of the first ten lines establishing the gold standard. But they are not in the Senate amendment anywhere.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. What is the difference between making the present bonds payable in gold and making them exchangeable for bonds that are payable in gold?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the precise difference between the House and Senate measures, and it is a very great difference. The Senate amendment simply provides that all the existing interest-bearing obligations of the Government at a certain rate provided, which shall not net more than 2½ per cent to the holders of the present bonds, may be exchanged for a 2 per cent gold bond of the Government. The holders of the outstanding obligations may at their option make that exchange.

Now, that may be objectionable to some Senators, but the remarkable fact that it is expected that we can fund the whole of our interest-bearing national debt in 2 per cent bonds is something wonderful to me. I suppose the committee really believe the exchange can be effected?

Mr. ALDRICH. We have no doubt about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. They believe it can be effected. I have some doubt whether it can be. If that was all there was in the measure, I should vote for it, because if it so happens that a 2 per cent gold bond is worth so much more than a bond payable in gold or silver at the option of the Government that our whole debt can be funded in it, it seems to me that it is a financial operation which it would be very judicious for the United States to make.

Mr. President, I think the question is a much broader one than that which is raised by the proposition to fund, with the consent of the holders, the existing national debt in a 2 per cent bond. It is a question whether the United States shall adopt the single gold standard, shall adopt gold monometallism, as its financial policy, or whether it shall continue its efforts to secure bimetallism—the use of both gold and silver as standard money. Upon that question I shall take occasion to speak to the Senate hereafter; but I thought it was well, inasmuch as the question has been raised, to have it settled to-day, if we can, so far as the interchange of views between Senators can settle it, whether or not there is in the Senate amendment any semblance of this first provision in the House bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from New Hampshire is undoubtedly right. There is nothing in the Senate substitute that in any manner changes the status of existing bonds, either directly or indirectly.

FRANCISCO V. DE COSTER.

Mr. NELSON. If there is no intention to debate further the financial bill this afternoon, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1298) granting pay and allowances to Francisco V. De Coster, late captain, First Battalion of Cavalry, Mississippi Marine Brigade.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUIVRE RIVER, MISSOURI.

Mr. ALLEN obtained the floor.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2279) declaring Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill just reported is very short; it affects only a little place in Missouri; it is recommended by the Secretary of War, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be now considered. It is only three or four lines long.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It declares that Cuivre River, in the counties of Lincoln and St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, is not a navigable stream, and shall be so treated by the Secretary of War and all other authorities.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like some little explanation of this bill by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will have the reports of the Secretary of War and the engineer officers printed in the RECORD if the Senator desires.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want those. I want the Senator's voice to explain to me the bill—how you can make a river not navigable by declaring it not navigable?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is clearly within the power of Congress to do that.

Mr. CHANDLER. To declare it nonnavigable?

Mr. COCKRELL. This river having been once appropriated for (I secured an appropriation some fifteen or eighteen years ago to have the snags removed from it), it has become, in the estimation of the War Department, a navigable highway. Now, railroads are running across there. They have to make their drawbridges. They have to put in their piers. They obstruct the flow of the river. There is no pretense that there is anything but 14 miles of it which, when the river is very high, becomes navigable. That is the only time it is navigable. We want this declared not a navigable river, that bridges may be constructed over it with longer spans and without these piers; and the people there—the farmers and everybody living along the stream—want this done. They have sent a petition here for it, and there is no public interest that can be harmed by it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator kindly inform me what has become of the money we spent to take out the snags and stumps?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose it was spent by the officers of the United States Engineer Corps in the payment of services and in payment for the time they spent there. I could get the Senator the accounts if he desires them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want them.

Mr. COCKRELL. And if it would interest him or convince him of the necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator must not get out of patience because I want to know the reason why this bill is to be passed. Whenever he objects to any bill I ask to have passed, I always explain it courteously and kindly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not objecting. If you want to object to the bill, object to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want the Senator from Missouri to tell me frankly whether or not it was not a mistake to make it navigable.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it was, in one sense of the word.

Mr. CHANDLER. And the expenditure of money upon it at that time was not wise?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it was very wisely spent.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri very frankly tells me, and I have no further objection to action upon the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. It gives me pleasure to tell anything that is the truth.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator can tell me anything more about it, I will listen with pleasure.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator wants to know anything more, I will tell him.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has very graciously more than satisfied me.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the reports I have referred to may be printed in the RECORD, so as not to consume the time of the Senate in reading them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, they will be printed in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1900.

SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to refer to you the inclosed bill (S. 2279), Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, declaring the Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream, and to request you to furnish the committee with such suggestions as you may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

I am, very respectfully,

WOODBURY PULSIFER, Clerk.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 27, 1900.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, inviting attention to the accompanying report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated January 26, 1900, and inclosures therein referred to.

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, January 26, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a letter, dated the 10th instant, from the Senate Committee on Commerce, inclosing for the views of the War Department thereon S. 2279, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, "A bill declaring Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream." Cuivre River lies wholly within the State of Missouri, flowing into the Mississippi River a short distance north of the mouth of the Missouri River. The river was examined in 1871 up to Moscow Mills, 28 miles above its mouth. An examination and survey was also made in 1880, which showed that a point known as "Chain of Rocks," 14½ miles above the mouth, might be properly considered the head of navigation.

The bill was referred to Capt. McD. Townsend, Corps of Engineers, and I beg to invite attention to his report thereon, a copy of which is inclosed. This report gives information regarding the present condition of the river, and it appears therefrom that its capacity for commerce is very small and that the public interests would not suffer from closing the river to navigation. I see no objection to the passage of the bill by Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. WILSON,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Rock Island, Ill., January 22, 1900.

Brig. Gen. JOHN M. WILSON,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith S. 2279, "A bill declaring Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream."

The Cuivre River empties into the Mississippi River about 22 miles above Grafton. It has a drainage area of about 1,600 square miles, and is susceptible of navigation at certain stages from its mouth to Chain of Rocks, a distance of 14½ miles. The mouth of the river is obstructed by a sand bar, which prevents navigation during low water. When the Cuivre River is at a high stage and the Mississippi is low, the current is so swift that the navigation of the stream is difficult.

The only period the Cuivre River can be considered a navigable waterway is when the Mississippi is at a high stage at the mouth of the Cuivre and the latter is at a low or medium stage. There has been expended on the Cuivre River by the United States the sum of $7,000 in snagging and dredging. This work was completed in 1882. Since that date it is reported that no boats have ascended the river, with the exception of some barges belonging to a contractor at work on the improvement of the Mississippi River, who obtained material for his work from this locality. A drawbridge at Old Monroe, built in 1883, has never been opened for boats. The people of the vicinity appear to be in favor of the proposed bill, as shown by the report of Inspector J. A. Macfie, inclosed herewith.

No amendments to the bill are proposed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. McD. TOWNSEND,
Captain, Corps of Engineers.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Rock Island, Ill., January 19, 1900.

CAPTAIN: As per your order, I have the honor to submit the following report on the navigation of the Cuivre River:

There is no steamboat traffic on the river. During 1899 Contractor James Short cut some brush along the banks. In 1895 or 1896 Mr. Short cut several hundred cords of wood on the Cuivre bottom lands, going up about 4 miles from the Mississippi and taking out the wood on barges. The General Barnard was the last boat to go through to Chain of Rocks, according to Dr. McElwee, in 1881 (records of this office). The steamer Dora made a few trips up the Cuivre in 1881. Some dredging was done in 1881 and 1882. The drawbridge at Old Monroe, built in 1883, has never been opened for boats.

At Old Monroe I found the farmers and merchants anxious to have the river closed to navigation. They hope, by arrangement with the railway company, to build a wagon bridge across the Cuivre alongside the track. There is no wagon bridge below Chain of Rocks. The ferry at Old Monroe can only be used during high water, and a wagon bridge is needed at that point.

At Chain of Rocks I was informed that a petition had been forwarded to Congressman CLARK, signed by practically all the farmers, asking to have the river closed to navigation.

At present the cross section at Old Monroe is small. To protect the piers large ice breakers have been built. The farmers think the bridge holds the water back, flooding their lands. The railway company has promised to put in one long span and remove the present obstruction.

I did not find any objection to the proposed Senate bill No. 2279, which has been mentioned in the local papers and seems to be understood by the people.

Copies of the bill were sent to Chain of Rocks.

At Old Monroe Mr. Niemeyer, the oldest and most influential resident, and at Chain of Rocks Dr. McElwee will furnish any information desired.

Respectfully submitted.

J. A. MACFIE,
United States Inspector.

Capt. C. McD. TOWNSEND,
Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., Rock Island, Ill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 1, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 31, 1900.

REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE.

Albert D. Chamberlin, of Inez, Wyo., to be register of the land office at Douglas, Wyo., to take effect January 13, 1900, at the expiration of his first term of office. (Reappointment.)

ASSISTANT SURGEON IN THE NAVY.

Karl Ohnesorg, a citizen of Connecticut, to be an assistant surgeon in the Navy, from the 27th day of January, 1900, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade.

CHIEF GUNNER IN THE NAVY.

Gunner Frank H. Whitney, to be a chief gunner in the Navy, from the 7th day of January, 1900, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1899.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Infantry arm.

Lieut. Col. William S. McCaskey, Twentieth Infantry, to be colonel, January 29, 1900, vice Coates, Seventh Infantry, retired from active service.

Maj. Charles R. Paul, Eighteenth Infantry, to be lieutenant-colonel, January 29, 1900, vice McCaskey, Twentieth Infantry, promoted.

Capt. George B. Walker, Eleventh Infantry, to be major, January 29, 1900, vice Paul, Eighteenth Infantry, promoted.

Corps of Engineers.

Maj. William H. Heuer, Corps of Engineers, to be lieutenant-colonel, January 29, 1900, vice Ludlow, who vacates by appointment as brigadier-general, United States Army.

Capt. Curtis McD. Townsend, Corps of Engineers, to be major, January 29, 1900, vice Heuer, promoted.

First Lieut. Edgar Jadwin, Corps of Engineers, to be captain, January 29, 1900, vice Townsend, promoted.

Second Lieut. Harley B. Ferguson, Corps of Engineers, to be first lieutenant, January 29, 1900, vice Jadwin, promoted.

APPOINTMENT IN THE VOLUNTEER ARMY—TWENTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY.

Sergt. Maj. Clyde B. Crusan, Twenty-seventh Infantry, United States Volunteers, to be second lieutenant, January 29, 1900, vice Cassels, promoted.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Ezra B. Bailey, of Connecticut, to be collector of customs for the district of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to succeed John H. Brocklesby, whose term of office will expire by limitation on February 14, 1900.

POSTMASTERS.

Philip Spaugh, to be postmaster at Hope, in the county of Bartholomew and State of Indiana, the appointment of a postmaster for the said office having, by law, become vested in the President on and after January 1, 1900.

William C. Balee, to be postmaster at Guthrie, in the county of Todd and State of Kentucky, the appointment of a postmaster for the said office having, by law, become vested in the President on and after January 1, 1900.

Wilbur Sawyer, to be postmaster at Brewer, in the county of Penobscot and State of Maine, in the place of E. B. Burr, whose commission expired January 15, 1900.

Charles E. Townsend, to be postmaster at Brunswick, in the county of Cumberland and State of Maine, in the place of W. M. Pennell, removed.

William H. Coffey, to be postmaster at Tufts College, in the county of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts, the appointment of a postmaster for the said office having, by law, become vested in the President on and after January 1, 1900.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MONUMENT TO SAMUEL HAHNEMANN.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed a Senate joint resolution identical in terms with House resolution No. 50. I move that the latter lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The Speaker announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 3. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

EXPERIMENTAL AGRICULTURE ON ARLINGTON ESTATE.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 1092) to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office, was read, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government is seized and possessed of a large tract of land containing 1,175 acres, situated just across the Potomac River, opposite Washington, D. C., known as the Arlington estate; and

Whereas only a portion of this large estate, to wit, about 400 acres, is used by the United States for a national cemetery, and for a military post, known as Fort Myer, leaving over 700 acres unused, uncared for, and fast becoming an unsightly waste of land overgrown with bushes and briers; and

Whereas the eastern portion of said large tract of land is not now used for any purpose and is susceptible of great improvement and well adapted for agricultural experimental purposes; and

Whereas it is desirous that the Agricultural Department of the United States should have land for experimental purposes and the practical illustration thereof: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby transferred and given to the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office over so much of the Government land in Alexandria County, Va., known as the Arlington estate, as lies east of the public road leading from the Aqueduct Bridge to Alexandria, Va., and between said road and the Potomac River, containing about 500 acres.

SEC. 2. That the declared purpose of this act is to set apart said tract of land as a general experimental farm in its broadest sense, where all that pertains to agriculture in its several and different branches, including animal industry and horticulture, may be fostered and encouraged, and the practice and science of farming in the United States advanced, promoted, and practically illustrated.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture will take immediate and absolute control of said property described in section 1, and by clearing, underdraining, grassing, laying out proper roads and driveways, constructing proper bridges and buildings, and in other ways as his judgment may dictate, bring said property as rapidly as possible into the proper condition to answer the purposes for which it is set apart.

SEC. 4. That in the development, improvement, and management of said property full discretion is hereby given the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office to carry into effect the declared purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. RAY of New York. Before unanimous consent is granted, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] a question. I notice this is a proposition to appropriate a part of the Arlington estate—lands, as I understand, adjoining the cemetery—to agricultural purposes. Before we grant any such authority, I would like to know whether it is quite certain that this appropriation of land to agricultural purposes will never interfere with the use of the estate for the purpose of a national cemetery, for which it is now used.

Mr. RIXEY. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], I will say that this estate, as is well known, contains about 1,175 acres, divided into two separate tracts by the Georgetown and Alexandria Railroad, which runs in a straight line through the property. To the west of this road are all the highlands belonging to the property. This tract to the west contains about 700 acres, about 60 acres of which are now used as a military post and 200 acres for the Arlington Cemetery, leaving between 400 and 500 acres which at present are not used. This bill, however, deals only with the lands lying between the public road and the river—the lands known as the low lands or flat lands of the Potomac—lands absolutely unsuited for cemetery purposes.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Does the Secretary of War consent to this proposition?

Mr. RIXEY. He does.

Mr. STEELE. I was about to ask the same question—whether this measure has the approval of the War Department?

Mr. RIXEY. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that this bill was introduced in the last Congress and was referred to the War Department for its recommendation. It was approved by that Department and also by the Secretary of Agriculture. During the present Congress the bill was reintroduced and again referred to the Secretary of War, whose letter I have here and will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 30, 1900.

SIR: I beg to hand you herewith a copy of H. R. bill 1092, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office," with amendments and interlineations, left by you at this office on Saturday last, together with a typewritten, clean copy thereof, and to remark that the bill as it appears with the amendments suggested meets the approval of this Department.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN F. RIXEY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RIXEY. Let me say that the amendments suggested by the War Department have been accepted by the committee, and I propose to offer them for adoption at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask whether this is a unanimous report from any committee?

Mr. RIXEY. It is; the Committee on Military Affairs was unanimous in its report to the last Congress. The report at this Congress is also unanimous.

Mr. PAYNE. I see the bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may build roads and bridges over the estate. It gives him pretty general authority in connection with this work of raising vegetables, etc.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from New York, I will say that this property is overgrown with bushes and in its present condition is practically useless for any ordinary purposes. This bill simply gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority to improve it so as to make it available for the purpose contemplated by the bill. It was thought best that wide discretion and authority should be given the Secretary of Agriculture. The Government does not part with its title. It still retains the property, but places it under jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department, where it will be improved and used for experimental agricultural purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. I thought perhaps it was for the improvement of the property rather than for the advantage of agriculture that the bill was introduced.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will improve both.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Virginia will be considered together by the House, and the Clerk will report the amendments.

There was no objection.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 9 of page 2, section 1 of the bill, after the word "about," strike out "five" and insert "four;" so that it will read "about 400 acres."

In line 7 of page 2, after the word "Virginia," insert "otherwise called the Georgetown and Alexandria road."

Amend by adding, after section 3, the following:

"Provided, That all improvements of or which may at any time be made upon said premises, as herein contemplated, shall be so located, constructed, and maintained as not to interfere with or obstruct the natural waterways or the sewers or other means now established or which may hereafter be provided, constructed, or maintained for the purpose of affording proper drainage and sewerage to the other portions of said estate: And provided further, That this act shall not impair or interfere with any of the rights heretofore granted by act of Congress to the Washington, Alexandria and Mount Vernon Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate its electric railroad across the said portion of the estate lying east of said public road."

At the end of section 1, on page 2, insert:

"With the exception, however, of a strip of land, as follows: Commencing at the point where the Georgetown and Alexandria road enters the Arlington estate on the north side; thence along said road 525 yards; thence in a line perpendicular to said road with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; thence along said canal to the south side of the reservation; jurisdiction over which is retained by the Secretary of War."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RIXEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GALVESTON HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 4481, to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, may be considered at this time. I ask that the reading of the original bill be dispensed with, in view of the fact that the committee has adopted a substitute which contains the provisions of the original bill, with some slight changes which are explained fully in the report of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman will have the substitute bill read?

Mr. BURTON. Of course. I was only desirous of saving time. I think it would be well to have the reading of the substitute first, or rather the report of the committee, which explains fully what the substitute contains.

I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the reading of the original bill be dispensed with, and the report, which describes the object of the bill and certain amendments in the nature of a substitute, be read, and then that the substitute bill be read and considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 4481, having duly considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill be amended by the adoption of the substitute filed herewith, and, when so amended, that the bill do pass.

House bill 4481 had for its object the correction of three errors in the river and harbor act which was approved March 3, 1899.

The bill as it passed the House contained the following item:

"Improving Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, Texas: For improvement of the Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, by dredging or otherwise, from the jetties at Galveston, Tex., up through the present ship channel and Buffalo Bayou to the proposed harbor site at Houston, Tex., to be provided by the citizens of Houston, $250,000: Provided, That out of said sum a suitable dredge may be constructed for said work."

A Senate amendment struck out the above paragraph and inserted the paragraph which the bill under consideration proposes to repeal. The conference committees agreed that the House provision should stand, with an amendment increasing the appropriation to $300,000, and that the provision proposed by the Senate should not stand. In the hurry of the closing days of the session the conference report on this item was so worded as to mislead the enrolling clerk into so enrolling the act as to leave standing both the amended House provision and the Senate provision.

The other two errors consist in referring to sections of the act by wrong numbers.

The act was scarcely enrolled in season for signature by the President and not in season to allow the errors to be detected and corrected.

It is conceded that said repeal should be made, and upon further consideration of the subject and in the light of more recent developments it has seen best also to substitute for the paragraph above mentioned the provision that the amount agreed upon in conference between the House and Senate, to wit, $300,000 together with any further amount for the improvement of the channel named, be applied after paying "such sums as may be necessary for administration, surveys, and maintenance" in improving division 1 of said survey, which extends from the mouth of the jetties of Galveston, through Galveston Bay to the north end of Morgan Canal, so called.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the substitute?

Mr. PAYNE. It has not been read yet.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7739) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out and repealing the paragraphs in said act on pages 1127 and 1128 of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 30, which read as follows:

Improving Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, Texas: For improvement of the Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, by dredging or otherwise, from the jetties at Galveston, Tex., up through the present ship channel and Buffalo Bayou to the proposed harbor site at Houston, Tex., to be provided by the citizens of Houston, $300,000: Provided, That out of said sum a suitable dredge may be constructed for said work.

For commencing the improvement of the water route from the mouth of the jetties at Galveston, through the existing ship channel and up Buffalo Bayou to Houston, Tex., including harbor at Houston, in accordance with project submitted by the Board of Engineers in report of survey dated November 3, 1897, $250,000: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for the whole or any part of such materials and work as may be required for prosecuting said improvement, or the said materials may be purchased and the work done otherwise than by contract, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000: Provided further, That out of said sum two dredges may be constructed for said work.

And amend said act so as to read, in place of said paragraphs repealed, as follows:

"Improving Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, Texas: For improvement of the Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou by dredging or otherwise, in accordance with the project submitted by a board of engineers in the report of a survey dated November 3, 1897, and submitted by the Chief of Engineers in his report for 1898, in volume 1, pages 288 and 289, $300,000: Provided, That all sums heretofore appropriated and available for work on Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou are hereby made available for said project: Provided further, That all of said sums of money not necessary for administration, surveys, and maintenance be used in improving division 1 of said survey."

SEC. 2. That section 12 of the same act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "fourteen" after the word "section," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eleven."

SEC. 3. That section 20 of the same act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "ten," after the word "sections," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "nine."

Mr. McRAE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] why this legislation can not be procured through the regular river and harbor bill, which, I trust, the committee will soon report to the House?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, the error is one which is so palpable that it calls for prompt correction without postponement.

Again, it has been decided by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that they will report no appropriation bill until the next session of this Congress.

Still further, the Engineer Department, noticing the ambiguity in the bill, have declined to take any action on either project until this was settled by Congress.

The third is, perhaps, the strongest reason of any, but it seems to me any one of the three is sufficient.

Mr. McRAE. I understand, then, that it is agreed that there will be no river and harbor bill at this session.

Mr. BURTON. The committee so decided yesterday.

Mr. McRAE. I make no objection to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] heard on this bill for a few minutes.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress there was an item of $250,000 proposed to be appropriated by the Rivers and Harbors Committee at this end of the Capitol. There was a Senate amendment striking out the original provision and inserting an amendment providing for $2,000,000 to be expended on the same project, namely, a ship channel from the jetties at Galveston to Houston, Tex. The Senate and House conferees agreed to strike out the Senate provision and restore that of the House, with an increase of $50,000, thus making $300,000 intended to be appropriated by both bodies for the project mentioned in the substitute bill just read.

As the chairman of the committee has stated, by an error in engrossing the bill both provisions were incorporated, and as it now stands there is a provision in the existing law for the expenditure of both the $300,000 intended by the Congress and the $2,000,000 inserted by the Senate amendment. That is an error, and so far as the immediate Representative of the district and his constituents are concerned, there is no objection to the repeal of the provision in the Senate appropriating $2,000,000 for this project, for the reason that it was not the intention of Congress to do so, and it was not the intention of the conference committee. I wish to say, as the Representative most nearly interested in this project, that the bill now under consideration does not appropriate a dollar, that it takes away $2,000,000 that has been already erroneously appropriated, and does not increase the obligations of the Government one cent; and I ask that the measure be permitted to go through without objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The substitute was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the original bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAY FOR CERTAIN RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE MARINE CORPS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the request that I made yesterday morning for unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution No. 77, to provide pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps, and I surrender the floor to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution No. 77. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, was unanimous consent given?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before unanimous consent is given, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The bill was read yesterday, but perhaps it had better be read again this morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not insist on that, Mr. Speaker, as I remember the bill. It can be read if desired. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to object to the present consideration, and I want to ask him if he has since examined it?

Mr. CANNON. I will say that I have read the bill, and while I have not given it as close an examination as I would if I had been reporting the bill, yet, from what the gentleman from Pennsylvania says and as far as I can see, the bill is a proper one.

I want to say just one word further. I objected yesterday, not on the ground that the bill itself was objectionable, but for the reason that the bill properly belonged, under the rules of the House, to the general deficiency bill. Now, I am quite sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the members of the House would acquit me of desiring to make any captious objection to any matter that ought to be enacted, and yet, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I feel that I owe a duty to the House, as well as along the lines of good legislation, to insist on the jurisdiction of the various committees being exercised. Otherwise you take a deficiency bill or a general appropriation bill, and if a number of committees have jurisdiction of them you never can tell "where we are at." Having said that much, and called the attention of the House to it, the fact that the urgent deficiency bill has passed the House, and there being no chance for this item to go into that or into the general bill for two or three months, on further consideration, believing that the bill ought to pass, I do not feel at liberty to insist on my objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I think it is bad practice to give unanimous consent without the bill being reported. I ask to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the aggregate of all sums appropriated in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, under the head "Pay, Marine Corps," shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund; the provisions of this act to take effect from June 30, 1899.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to this day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 7433, the Indian appropriation bill, and pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to this day.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman that, so far as I am advised, an agreement of that kind would be satisfactory to this side of the House. I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, who it was that objected?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think no member objected under the rules, as I saw no member rise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair, for the consideration of House bill 7433, the Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill the title of which has just been read carries appropriations aggregating, in round numbers, $7,328,000. The like bill for the last fiscal year appropriated $7,500,000, this bill carrying $172,000 less than last year's appropriation bill. The amount of the original estimates, which reached us through the Treasury Department, was less by five hundred thousand and some odd dollars than the amount which we herein appropriate; but subsequent to the receipt of the original estimates supplemental estimates have been submitted through the Treasury Department which aggregated $641,000, an amount in excess by $113,000 of the amount which the bill carries.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it is well, in considering this appropriation bill, to have in mind a few facts with reference to these people for whom it provides. There are in the United States to-day, including those of Alaska, about 250,000 Indians. Of these, 5,000 are in Alaska and about 65,000 in the Five Civilized Tribes, so called, in the Indian Territory. Of the Indians outside of those in the Indian Territory, 60,000 to 70,000 are ration Indians, Indians receiving rations to a greater or less extent from the Government during each year. Ninety thousand of these Indians have discarded the blanket entirely and are clothed in the ordinary citizen's clothes, and 35,000 of them use the clothing of citizens in part. Thirty-five thousand can read, and there are occupied by the entire Indian race in the neighborhood of 25,000 dwellings, leaving a comparatively small percentage of the Indians who now dwell in anything other than houses. The Indians occupy reservation lands and allotments, the majority—a large majority—being on reservation lands.

These lands are comprised within about 150 reservations, and they occupy about 130,000 square miles. Besides the money which we appropriate in this bill for the care of the Indians, they have their own funds in the Treasury of the United States, interest on which is paid to them and paid to them without any annual legislation. These funds all together amount to thirty-odd millions, about $32,000,000, yielding an annual income of $1,600,000. One tribe, the Osage tribe, alone has in the Treasury upward of $8,000,000 to-day, which draws interest at 5 per cent. There are about 1,700 Osages, and this fund provides for the annual payment to them of a little short of $250 per capita. I understand that this makes this tribe the richest per capita people on the face of the earth.

Mr. DALZELL. Where are they?

Mr. SHERMAN. In Oklahoma; on their own reservation in Oklahoma. There are certain changes in the current bill from last year's bill. Some items are larger than last year and others are smaller. Under two very large treaty obligations final payments were due last year, and the appropriation therefor amounted to nearly $300,000, so that our treaty obligations are less than they were in the last fiscal year, and of necessity our gratuities for the Indians have somewhat increased, because it is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to immediately cut off from these people help from the Government, when their own funds are greatly reduced or entirely expended.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. Is the general aggregate of the bill less than it was last year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the general aggregate is $175,000 less than last year, and the report sets out in detail every item of its increase and each item of decrease from last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. TALBERT. And summing up the whole, it is $175,000 less than last year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; about $175,000 less than last year's appropriation.

There is no item in the bill as reported, Mr. Chairman, for the continuance of the so-called contract schools. That is a question which gentlemen here remember has caused considerable discussion and not a little friction upon the floor. That is not in the bill this year, and there is no school for which any appropriation is made, other than Government schools, save only the Hampton Institute, in Virginia, for which an appropriation of $20,000 is carried in the bill.

There are a few items in the bill which are legislative, I expect; some of them, I am quite sure, are subject to a point of order; and perhaps if I were not chairman of the committee, I would raise the point of order, not on the theory that they are not proper legislation, but that some of these matters might better be considered by a separate bill rather than as an item of the appropriation bill; but with reference to each and every of those items we will have further discussion, I suppose, when they are reached in the reading of the bill by sections. I think, Mr. Chairman, the statement

I have made covers briefly the salient points of the matters which will come up for consideration in the pending bill, and unless some member of the committee desires to ask me some specific question, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman one question: If all the other contract schools have been discontinued, as the gentleman states, why has an exception been made with reference to the Hampton School? I merely ask this question for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because the committee believed that the Hampton School is doing a work far superior to that done by any other contract school, Hampton being a manual training school, and no other contract school being of that character, and also educates with the Indians another race.

Mr. COWHERD. If I have read the bill aright, the sum of $300,000 is appropriated for the Dawes Commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COWHERD. If I understand correctly, this commission is charged with the responsibility of making appraisements and assessments of lands to the Indians under what is known as the Curtis bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COWHERD. I also understand that pending the making of these allotments business in the Territory is practically suspended, and that this condition reaches out to all the adjoining States, affecting business there also. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman whether any estimate has been made as to how much money will be needed in order to hasten the allotment of these lands—whether, if a liberal appropriation, such as has been estimated for by the Dawes Commission, were made, the work could not be done much more rapidly than is provided for in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. The original estimate made by the Dawes Commission was for an appropriation on $171,000. The question now propounded by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] was asked by the Secretary of the Interior of the commission—whether or not with a larger appropriation they could not hasten their work; and there was a request from the Secretary that they should submit to him an estimate under which they believed they could conclude the work in the Indian Territory within twelve months. They did submit such an estimate, amounting to $641,000. Then, after the members of the Dawes Commission—all four of them, I believe, certainly three; perhaps Mr. Needles was not present—were before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and we had a discussion of this whole question lasting an entire morning, the result of which was that the members of the commission then present expressed the opinion that with $300,000 they could work with the greatest advantage during the coming year; that with this sum they could do the work in a way which would be entirely satisfactory to everybody, but that with the larger appropriation—$641,000—there would be required greater haste and there could not be insured as much accuracy in the work as if less haste were adopted.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman will excuse me for occupying his time——

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, that is what we are here for.

Mr. COWHERD. But this is a very important matter, especially to the commercial communities doing business in that part of the country.

I understand that a great many millions of acres of land are to be surveyed, appraised, and allotted. Now, if a liberal appropriation were made, would it not simply mean the putting of more surveying parties in the field, whereas with a small appropriation this thing must drag on for several years, the work being done only by small surveying parties?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is force in the gentleman's suggestion; but we thought that an appropriation of $300,000 would be a liberal appropriation, and would admit of very rapid progress of this work. With this appropriation it seems likely that the entire work in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations can be finished within the fiscal year, the work already having been completed in the Seminole Nation, thus leaving only the work in the Creek and Cherokee nations to be concluded in future years.

This question was considered very carefully, discussed very thoroughly in the committee. Mr. Dawes himself was present, and also Mr. Bixby and Judge McKinnon, and they agreed in our conclusion that an appropriation of $300,000 would permit them to continue the work very advantageously.

Mr. COWHERD. How much of this appropriation of $300,000 will be available for the use of these surveying parties who are making the allotments?

Mr. SHERMAN. The greater part of it. If the gentleman will look at the appropriate page of the bill he will see that upward of $200,000 will be available for that purpose.

Mr. TALBERT. I see that here on the last page of the report there are named certain new matters embraced in this bill which do not involve appropriations, and the committee proceeds to name five or six of these items. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the members of the committee were unanimous in regard to the adoption of these five or six new items of business, in accordance with the provisions of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. My recollection is that they were not unanimous in reference to all of them.

Mr. TALBERT. But none of these items, as I understand, carries any appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. None of those specified carry appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it necessary at this time to enter into a general discussion of the policy of this bill. The fact is that it contains no change of the general policy of the Government in regard to its Indian wards. I shall reserve whatever discussion I wish to make upon the bill until we are proceeding under the five-minute rule, believing that in that way we can reach more intelligently the points under discussion.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COONEY].

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any special provision in this bill; but through the courtesy of the gentleman from Arkansas I desire to address the Committee on the Whole upon a subject which perhaps is not entirely foreign to the one which is now before the House for consideration.

If certain forces which are at work in the country at the present time become paramount and triumphant, it will not be very long before we will be compelled annually to examine and discuss appropriation bills for the Philippine Islands, and against that anticipated and possible appropriation I desire to submit to the committee a few remarks.

I favor the open-door policy for commerce; but I would close against the United States of America the open doors to imperialism everywhere. For that reason I have been opposed to the taking and retention of the Philippines. The development of this Republic from its foundation to the present time has been along the lines of security. Its expansion has been one of necessity, but the effort of the President to reach out to the Philippines is an expansion by imitation only. The example of the great colonial powers of the world, which we have ever been taught to shun, has become the chief inducement to the Administration to stretch the nation's limits into the Orient.

In all history there is recorded but one other attempt at expansion by imitation alone that is worthy of consideration or comparison with this. That attempt is related in the fables of Æsop. That great historian tells us in a few graphic lines the disastrous results of counterfeit expansion on the frog which tried to imitate the bull in size; and if this McKinley Administration keeps up its present process of expansion in swollen mimicry of John Bull, another Æsop will be needed to gather up its remains and record its sad fate after the next elections.

I do not believe the people of the United States will ever consent to these islands being admitted into the Union as a State; nor will they, on the other hand, tolerate a connection with them by ligaments that have their growth in colonial despotism. If there is any middle policy to be pursued in the government of these islands, it is time to declare it. If the Republican party has not the wisdom to declare its policy through Congress now, a year hence it will not have the power. The greatest question that now confronts the American people is their present and future relations to these islands. Are they to be prepared for eventual independence? Are they to be given home rule under American government? Are they to be held as a vassal colony? These are interrogations with which the public now daily addresses this House.

This Congress has no question before it that so strongly presses for an immediate answer. It involves a repose from agitation at home, peace to the people of those far-away islands, and a cessation from the useless sacrifice of human life. It involves the future structure and aims of our own Government, the amount to which our appropriation bills are to be swelled, and the burden of tax we are to place upon the backs of the American people now and hereafter. While anxiety and expectancy stand waiting on Congress to settle so vital a question, why should it longer delay an expression of its purpose? We have given the Administration a whole year to settle this question in its own way, and if, as now seems to be the purpose, it is given another year of its own way in the Philippines, when it turns those islands over to this House for legislation, their condition will be fit only for despotism.

We must not forget that when we first came in contact with the Philippines that the rapidly decaying power of Spain was each year bringing them nearer to the achievement of their own independence; that before we purchased the slippery and uncomfortable position of the Spaniard, their future was pregnant with a living freedom. But their liberties and future well-being have received no consideration at our hands. What fortunes can be made, and what is the character of government that will best secure to us those fortunes, are now the chief subjects of inquiry. Industries are to be monopolized, franchises are to be given away, and for the 1,200 islands there are 1,200 Sancho Panzas waiting on the promise of the chief knight errant of expansion to be made governors. The supposed wealth and fortune producing power of those islands is what now imperils their liberties. Their prospects have been placed in the hands of expansion brokers, whose business it is to puff their value and in this struggle to enlist cupidity on the side of imperialism.

A gentleman who traveled in the Philippines had occasion not long ago to address an audience of American citizens on this subject. He drew from his vest pocket a nugget of gold and said:

I have a nugget of pure gold picked up in its present form on the banks of a Philippine creek.

He drew from his other vest pocket a bag of gold dust and said:

I have gold dust washed out by careless natives from the sands of a Philippine stream.

His whole argument was an exhibition of the wealth he had brought back from those islands in his vest pockets. In its power, in its intended purpose, and in its spectacular delivery, if it did not imitate, it certainly equaled the famous argument of Cato when he drew the Carthagenian figs from the pocket of his toga and passed them around to the members of the Roman Senate with the declaration, "Delenda est Carthago!" And hence, on account of the nugget and gold dust, the liberties of the Filipinos must be destroyed. Logic clothed in human language has never yet been found that could successfully answer such an argument. It is only where civilization is so strong and just as to render such an argument its own refutation that the human species can be rescued from the villainy of its intention.

But, in passing, it is well to remark that Cato was a cruel man; that upon retiring at night he was in the habit of calling his slaves around him and administering to them severe punishment with his own hand to dispose his mind and body to restful slumber. Cato was the most sordid and avaricious of Romans. He was a commercialist who pushed his ventures on sea and land with the ever-expanding limits of the Roman Republic. The poet Terence in his lifetime more than once declared that the figs produced in the Roman Senate never came from Carthage, but were plucked by Cato from his own trees that grew on his Sabine farm. He denominated the incident as "Cato's great political fig trick." Cato was in a certain sense a patriot, but the object of his patriotism was the commercial and militant expansion of the Roman Republic.

Under the forces which he had set in motion to accomplish that object he had the misfortune to live and see Roman virtue wither up, personal independence decay, the tooth of greed eat its way to the hearts of the Roman people, corruption and bribery made the chief pathways to eminence and glory, and the Republic tottering to its downfall under the cares with which it was burdened. In the short space of one generation after him Cato's kinsman and namesake saw the utter collapse of the Roman Republic and the rise of Cæsar's empire on its ruins, and in remorse he slew himself. History is but getting ready to repeat itself in a country when to the minds of its most eminent citizens it begins to suggest the revival of its old "fig tricks."

There are those who attempt to impress the public with the belief that the insurgents are encouraged in their resistance and that this war has been lengthened out by a few old fogies who still have the discourtesy and temerity to suggest the application of the principles of the Declaration of Independence and of free government as a solution of our difficulties in the Philippines. But there is no evidence that either the brain or the arm of the Administration has been paralyzed by such a suggestion, and it is improbable that it escaped beyond the blue-pencil lines of our military satrapy at Manila. [Applause.]

Doubtless the President has had to defend his rest at night by thrusting his dagger through the ancient ghost of that once immortal Declaration, and in his dreams he may have again witnessed the pale and drowning features of the Monroe doctrine, to the neck of which he tied a millstone and left it to sink in mid-ocean. But in his waking moments, to all such suggestions and airy figments of the sleeping brain his challenge of defiance has invariably been, an order for more transports to Manila. With a triumphant Army on land and an invincible Navy on the sea, the President has had at his command for the past year a greater force than was ever placed at the disposal of any other President to conduct a foreign war or repel a foreign invasion, and it must be a mighty poor cause in which that force has been engaged if its efficiency in the Philippine Islands has been crippled by the reading of the Declaration of Independence in the United States.

There are only two reasons why this war has languished for a whole year; but two things that have given life and support to the insurrection. One is that Aguinaldo has refused to bring his army into the open and give us battle; the other is that the President has refused to bring the purpose of his Administration or government into the open, that it might be seen and understood by all men. The President has said to Aguinaldo: "If you will stop your running and hiding in the brush, if you will cease your cowardly evasion of my troops and boldly give us battle, we will make short work of you and of this war." Aguinaldo, in reply, has said: "Mr. President, if you will come out of the fog of 'manifest destiny,' out of your political schemes for power at home and your dreams for a world-wide empire abroad, and boldly and without evasion declare that we shall have the same rights in our homes that Americans have in theirs, that we shall be given the right to manage our internal affairs, enjoy the wealth, products, and franchises of our own country, even though it be under the American flag and the just laws of Congress, then this war is already at an end." [Renewed applause.]

But, sir, it must have been perceived long ago by all intelligent people that the President's object in the Philippines was not to give them freedom, nor to give them the usual Territorial government which the United States has conferred on all its territory while unripe for statehood. To lay the foundations for the future rise of a republic in the heart of Britain's colonies, or, by the establishment of the usual Territorial government, to confer the proud distinction of free American citizenship on the inhabitants of the Philippines in the presence of Britain's base colonial subjects, is not to be thought of. It would be like setting fire to your neighbor's house. It would be but a poor return to Great Britain for having conducted us safely and triumphantly through the Spanish war to set the lamp of American liberty burning where it might awaken the slumbering millions within her dark colonial empire. England would never permit it. It would be open violence to that unwritten treaty whose invisible and mysterious bonds hold the administrations of the two Governments in sympathy and unity of purpose.

The small matter of the American Constitution and the citizenship with which it clothes the humblest being within the reach of its power must not be permitted to stand in the way of such heaven-born friendship. That friendship, sometimes interpreted as "our obligations to other nations," as "the preservation of the world's peace," etc., has imposed upon the President the hard task of preserving in those islands the statu quo ante bellum, to suppress their ambition for liberty, and to maintain the equilibrium of colonial despotism that has heretofore prevailed in that part of the world. In line with that purpose, his object has been to make the Philippines a subservient colony of the United States; and the modern colony means slavery to its inhabitants, expense to the country that holds it, but privileges, power, profit, and robbery to the officials who govern it. It is the same old slavery that Aguinaldo and his dusky followers and their ancestors have been fighting against for three hundred years under Spanish rule.

Before peace was broken by force of arms between the Filipino and American, while they were yet on terms of friendship and alliance, they besought the President to inform them of the policy of his Administration and to consult them upon the future government of the islands. He refused to hear them. They sent a trusted agent across the seas and continents to the city of Washington to see the President, and to consult with him on those subjects which are to any people dearer than life and fortune—their liberty and their nationality. He refused to hear him. That agent was not even permitted to remain quietly in this city while the fate of his people and country stood trembling in the balance.

The President's displeasure at his presence here incited the Administration newspapers to hound him down as a miscreant and a vagabond, and when abuse failed to drive him from the city the police and secret detective forces were set upon his trail, who waylaid and browbeat him upon the streets and in the lobbies of his hotel, until, as a stranger in a strange city, he was made conscious of impending personal violence, and he fled in fear in the nighttime from the city of Washington. I am not speaking of an event that occurred in one of the South American Republics, nor in the dominion of the Sultan of Turkey, nor in the Empire of the Czar of Russia, but here in the capital of this great Republic, under the eye and apparent sanction of its Chief Executive, in the shadow of the figure of Freedom that stands erect on the Dome of this building, but 20 miles from Mount Vernon, with all its historic associations of freedom and liberty, and only 3 miles from Arlington, where through swelling woods thousands of tombstones attest the veneration in which is held the memory of those who fought and died for the freedom of the black man.

There may have been diplomatic difficulties in the way of his recognition as an agent of the Philippines, but, sir, it is the first instance in the history of this Republic that any individual has approached its shores with a mission of liberty for his own or any other people that has been received as a public enemy and driven from it by fear of public violence. This incident is but one in the many that mark the unvarying disposition that the Administration and its satraps have exercised toward these people. From the surrender of the Spanish army in the Philippines, accomplished by their assistance, they have everywhere been treated with that contempt which drove them to their arms and their rice swamps, where, as they believed, since they could not live in dignity in their own homes, they could at least die in imitation of freemen.

Do we intend to hold the Philippines, and forever? Then is it not a good thing to stop this war? Is it not a good thing to conciliate a people we aim to add to our own population, whose territory we aim to incorporate with our own? If so, then let us make an effort to accomplish such a desirable result by an honest declaration of our purpose. The idea that such a declaration will detract from the dignity of the American people is absurd; the idea that we must crush them by force before we open our lips is brutal. I warn you now that the conduct of this Administration has placed the conciliation of these people absolutely beyond its power; the hand that has so mercilessly inflicted the wound upon them can never heal it; nor can another year of Administration rule and free trips to picnicking commissions to the woods of Luzon bring to this House additional light on the Declaration of Independence or the principles of just government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Outside of Administration circles there is not one in the 75,000,000 American people that feels proud of this war. It does not meet their approbation. They do not desire to see this chapter of our history prolonged. It is now the darkest and most infamous chapter in all our history. The challenge lies at the feet of every defender of McKinley, and they are defied to produce from the annals of Roman aggression, or the wide range of history, another chapter that will surpass in perfidy and meanness to a weak and struggling people the one which this Administration has been writing for us in the Philippine Islands during the past eighteen months. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COONEY. I should like to have a minute more.

Mr. LITTLE. I yield the gentleman five minutes' additional time.

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, this is not a war for the maintenance of any right or principle of this Government; but everywhere it is looked upon as a war that strikes a mortal blow at the principle of self-government, which is the very life of the Republic. I believe that principle is yet dear to the American heart; it is engraved upon it as a holy instinct, and he who has thus for a while presumed to violate and trample it beneath his feet, will by the blessing of God soon be hurled from power, and another placed therein—one who will smite the trusts, dissolve the gold standard, and clean the temple of our country of its money changers and public plunderers; one who will reanimate the drooping form of liberty, and direct the course of the Republic to the bright pathway of freedom, where it will again decorate and cheer the elevated sphere in which its founders placed it; one who will tear from the bosom of modern plutocracy the budding hope that calls for "a McKinley and an empire," and inscribe in the hearts of the people the nobler sentiment, "Bryan and the Republic." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is understood that we will complete the occupation of the hour on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. LITTLE. Does he desire to be recognized now or at the completion of our hour?

The CHAIRMAN. According as the gentleman may desire.

Mr. LITTLE. I would prefer that the hour on this side be completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has only twenty-eight minutes remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries appropriations amounting to $7,328,000, a less amount by $176,000 than was carried by this bill of last year. This money is appropriated for the civilization and education of 250,000 Indians. It might be appropriate to state here that if it requires more than $7,000,000 per annum to civilize and educate a quarter of a million of half-civilized Indians, it will require $48,000,000 per year to civilize and educate the Filipinos if we carry out the expansion policy that this Government has entered upon and take under the folds of the Stars and Stripes the 12,000,000 similar semicivilized people living in the Philippine Islands.

But, sir, it is not my desire to speak upon the question of expansion to-day. My opposition to the annexation of the Philippines is well known. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have room for expansion upon our own continent and within the confines of our own country. I refer to that magnificent scope of arid territory west of the one hundredth meridian. One-half of the area of the United States lies in the arid belt of our country. With the exception of a small scope of country west of the Cascade Mountains in Washington and Oregon, the rest of the country from the one hundredth meridian to the Pacific is arid. The country demanding irrigation—one-half of the territory of our own country—can be developed and expanded by irrigation. You have only to look, as I have before stated on this floor, to my own district in the State of Texas, comprising eighty counties, to find as much territory as you will have in the Philippine Islands.

That territory has less than 3 inhabitants to the square mile, while the Philippine Islands have 60 inhabitants to the square mile. Hence, there is twenty times more room for expansion in my district than there is in the whole of the Philippine Islands. By a judicious expenditure of money in that arid country we can place there 60 inhabitants to the square mile, and these inhabitants will be of our own Anglo-Saxon race. We can, by building irrigation dams upon the heads of our rivers and streams, impound the storm waters that now go to waste and overflow and destroy the crops in the valleys of the lower rivers, and utilize this water for irrigation purposes in this arid region and make it one of the best parts of our Union. Most of this arid belt lies on the head waters of the Mississippi River, and a system of large storage reservoirs would prevent the annual overflow of the lower valley of that great river.

What is true there is true of New Mexico and Arizona and that great scope of country stretching northward from Mexico to the British possessions, amounting to about 540,000,000 acres of land. Congress has by different acts provided funds for surveying these irrigable lands and locating reservoir cites.

The officer in charge of this work, Mr. Newell, of the Geological Survey, reports that about 74,000,000 acres of public land can be reclaimed by irrigation, and but only a part of the survey has been completed. It is estimated that at least 150,000,000 acres of these lands can be made productive and placed under irrigation ditches. This vast amount of land would sustain the present population of our country with ease and comfort. The most rabid expansionist should be satisfied with reclaiming this, our own territory, and cease from violating one of the Ten Commandments by coveting our neighbors' (the Filipinos') lands. Nearly all of these lands belong now to our Government. I now present a very pertinent letter from the Chicago Federation of Labor on this question. It is as follows, viz:

CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Chicago, January 22, 1900.

DEAR SIR: The working people of this country feel that they have a great hope for the future in the immense area of public land which still belongs to the Government.

If this magnificent heritage of the people is preserved for them it will afford an outlet for our surplus labor and surplus population for many years to come.

We must have such an outlet. Various labor-saving devices and combinations are constantly lessening the opportunities for the wage-workers to get employment.

The reclamation of the arid public lands by the Government would give opportunities for millions of our people to get, first, employment, and then homes, where they could live in comfort on the land.

When you consider that Arizona is larger than the Philippines, and that the Salt and Gila River valleys in that Territory would sustain as great a population as the whole Kingdom of Belgium, you can form some idea of what it would mean to the laboring men of this country if these Government lands were reclaimed and made habitable by building Government reservoirs and irrigation works.

The Government would get back from the sale of the land a great deal more than it would spend to reclaim it.

The Chicago Federation of Labor has given much consideration to this subject, and has passed the following resolutions:

"That all the remaining public lands of the United States should be sacredly held for the benefit of the whole people, and that no grants of the title to any of these lands should ever hereafter be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the land;" and "That the Federal Government should build storage reservoirs to save the flood waters that are now wasted, and should, wherever necessary, build the irrigation works required for the reclamation and settlement of the arid public lands."

Several schemes for ceding the public lands to the States or Territories are now before Congress. We are convinced that if such donations are made it is certain to result in the lands being eventually gotten hold of by speculators, and that great land monopolies would close the door to the workingmen who want the land for homes.

We earnestly ask that you will use all your influence to prevent any of the public lands from being ceded to the States or Territories.

Hoping for a favorable reply, I remain,

Yours, respectfully,

[SEAL.] W. CARMODY,
Secretary Chicago Federation of Labor.

Hon. JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.

This letter shows that the laboring people of the country demand that Congress shall take up and solve the problem of the irrigation and development of our own arid territory.

I also call your attention to another body of citizens who demand of us prompt action on this great subject. I refer to the resolutions passed by the last meeting of the Irrigation Congress. They are as follows, viz:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE NATIONAL IRRIGATION CONGRESS, EIGHTH SESSION.

Resolved, That we advocate and reaffirm the policy and principles heretofore enunciated by this congress in its former session, as set forth in the following resolutions:

LEASING OF THE GRAZING LANDS.

We favor the leasing of the public grazing lands at a nominal rental in limited areas to settlers farming adjacent lands, the revenue from rentals to go to the States and Territories wherein the lands are situated, for irrigation development, leases to be subject to right of reclamation by irrigation and of settlement of lands actually cultivated, title of land to remain in Federal Government until actual settlement, the leasing of said lands to be under the control of States where situated, and the revenues arising therefrom to be expended by the States under the direction of their State engineering bureaus: Provided, That in any State having no irrigation bureau the Federal Government may lease the lands and expend the revenues in the construction of irrigation works in that State.

FEDERAL STORAGE RESERVOIRS.

We favor the preservation and development of our national resources by the construction of storage reservoirs by the Federal Government for flood protection and to save for use in aid of navigation and irrigation the flood waters which now run to waste and cause overflow and destruction, as recommended in the report of Col. Hiram M. Chittenden, and we urge the adoption of the recommendations of this report as to the construction of storage reservoirs in the arid regions as a part of the national policy of internal improvements.

ARID LAND RECLAMATION.

We favor the construction by the Federal Government of storage reservoirs and irrigation works wherever necessary to furnish water for the reclamation and actual settlement of the arid public lands.

UNITED OWNERSHIP OF LAND AND WATER.

The value of the irrigated farm and the security of the home thereby created are alike dependent upon sufficient public control of the water supply and the prevention of water becoming a speculative commodity. We believe that the water of all streams should forever remain public property, and that the right to its use should inhere not in the individual or the ditch, but in the land reclaimed.

HARMONIOUS IRRIGATION LAWS.

We urge the adoption of a harmonious system of irrigation laws in all of the arid and semiarid States and Territories, under which the right to the use of water for irrigation shall vest in the user and become appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use be the measure of the right, and the irrigated home be protected from litigation by the establishment of a State system for the equitable and final adjustment of the rights of irrigators to the distribution of the waters of the streams.

INTERSTATE RIVERS.

We favor the establishment of a national commission for the equitable adjustment of all differences arising from the appropriation and use of the waters of the interstate rivers.

We oppose the cession of the public lands of the nation to the respective States and Territories, except upon conditions so strict that they will insure the settlement of such lands by actual settlers in small tracts, and absolutely prevent their absorption in large bodies under private ownership.

GOVERNMENT SURVEYS AND INVESTIGATION.

We commend the efforts of the various bureaus of the National Government in the examination of the physical and legal conditions relating to irrigation and their work in promoting the adoption of more effective customs and methods of irrigation, and urge upon Congress the necessity of providing liberal appropriations for this important work.

Mr. Chairman, I had the honor of introducing in this House a bill, now before the Committee on Public Lands, for the purpose of leasing the arid public lands of the United States. We have probably 400,000,000 acres of these arid grazing lands. If they were leased (as they could be if we would pass the bill I have proposed) at 2 cents per acre, they would bring in $8,000,000 per year as an irrigation fund. The leasing of the public domain is urged by the irrigation congress in one of the resolutions I have read. My bill contains many sections similar to the Texas lease law. The lease price is fixed at 3 cents per acre for watered and 2 cents for unwatered lands. Any person leasing one watered section must also lease three unwatered sections if found contiguous.

One man is permitted to lease only two sections of watered and six sections of unwatered land. Watered lands are to be leased for five years and unwatered lands for ten years. The lessee is to have prior right of leasing for ninety days after the expiration of his lease. The funds arising from the leases are to become a trust fund, to be used by Congress in the States and Territories where collected for irrigation purposes. The bill provides that this money shall be placed in the United States Treasury and there held as a trust fund for irrigating purposes.

Under existing conditions in that arid grazing Territory we find that but few men own the land that they are grazing their herds of cattle and sheep upon, and the country is all a common. A cow or sheep owner will drive his herd into the country and will take any unoccupied territory that he can find and call it his own, and forbid anyone else to use the land. If he has a few thousand cattle, he employs men enough to keep other people off by force. Very often sheep men will force their herds upon these large cattle ranges. Sheep and cattle will not range together, and trouble at once arises between the owners of the herds, as every man who lives in the West can testify from actual experience, these feuds very often resulting in the destruction of property and sometimes in murder.

If you will pass a bill leasing these lands to the stockmen, in limited quantities, these troubles will not arise. The lessee can then fence the land, put up their windmills, build their houses, and use whatever appliances they may see proper for the purpose of improving their ranches and developing the country either for stock raising or for farming purposes. The settlers could and would then build permanent homes for themselves and their families. Their improvements would become taxable property and benefit the State or Territory where they live. These people would no longer be nomads, roaming wherever they see proper, but they would become settled and permanent citizens. They would have some place to call their own.

This bill provides that they can hold the land for ten years, and that then they shall have the preference right to re-lease it, it remaining all the while a part of the public land of the United States. This fund, $4,000,000 per year, would be sufficient to start irrigation plants all over that country, the money being expended in the district or in the State or Territory where it was raised. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why it is that the Government should not take hold of this matter, individualize its lands, and build up these waste places in our own country. In my own State we have a great many arid grazing lands of similar character to the territory of the United States stretching from Mexico to the British possessions west of the one hundredth meridian. Arid grazing lands should be leased. I have a letter from the treasurer of the State of Texas showing what a magnificent fund the State is deriving from a lease law similar to the one that I have introduced in this Congress. I will send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, STATE OF TEXAS,
Austin, January 8, 1900.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Replying to your kind inquiry of the 4th instant concerning the lease lands of Texas, beg to advise you as follows:

The total number of acres leased is about 16,500,000, at the rate of 3 cents per acre, making an income to the State therefrom of about $500,000 per year. The cost to the State of collecting this money is very little, and I think $6,000 per year will fully cover it.

Prior to 1895 the State leased its lands at 4 cents per acre, but on account of the severe droughts of 1894 and 1895 the rate was decreased to 3 cents. Since that time the rise in the price of cattle, together with the good seasons, making grass good, has greatly increased the demand for grazing lands, and the public domain and free-school lands of the State are being leased now at a rate greatly in excess of all previous years, and the income to the State for 1900 will go beyond the figures given above.

These figures are approximated, but are very conservative. At any time I can furnish you any information, or aid you in any way in this or other matters, command me, and I will cheerfully respond.

Wishing you much success in your efforts, and a Happy New Year, I am,
Your friend,

JNO. W. ROBBINS.

Hon. JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the State of Texas can raise a fund of $500,000 per year by leasing its arid lands, why is it that the United States can not benefit herself in the same way?

When Texas became a State of this Union she reserved her public domain. We have a magnificent permanent school fund from this lease money and from the sale of our land. We are leasing not only our public-school lands, but our public domain.

Stepping across the line into New Mexico, where they have no lease law, we find an entirely different and worse state of affairs. On the Texas side we have fenced pastures, splendid cattle, good ranch houses, our people living in permanent homes and doing well in every respect. Over in New Mexico, where the ranchmen have no lease laws, they have no permanent homes, and we find only contention, turmoil, and strife. In order to improve and utilize this public domain, it is necessary that we should have a lease law and lease our grazing lands and irrigate our irrigable lands.

Passing from that question to the Indian question, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Indians should have their lands allotted among them. Their tribal relations should be destroyed. The lands that they do not use should be sold under the United States land laws to actual settlers. The young Indian that we educate should have a home to go to that he could call his own. As we now conduct Indian affairs, the young Indian on his return home is turned loose in his tribe and drops back into barbarism, and is no better probably than he was before we educated him at the expense of the Government.

The mining laws of the United States should be extended over all the Indian reservations. I know of no reason why a belt of country comprising often millions of acres of mineral lands should be locked out from the American prospector. We have a great many Indian reservations in the mountainous part of the West that are known to be rich in minerals. The United States laws will not permit the prospector to go on these lands and open up and develop the mines.

It would be much better for the Indians as well as the white men to allot their lands, to open them for settlement and for mining purposes.

The Indian imitates the white man. The lower races have that characteristic generally, and if we place farmers on these Indian lands and let the Indians see that they are making a success of the cultivation of the land, they will imitate them.

If we permit the prospector to go into the mountains of their reservations and develop their mines, it will give employment to those Indians and will aid us in civilizing them. The time should soon come when we will stop spending millions of dollars yearly for the education and support of these people. We should make them self-supporting, and we can never do it until we break up their tribal relations, until we give each Indian a separate piece of land, telling him that is his home and that he must live upon it and work like the white man, and that he can no longer draw rations and clothes from the Government and lie around the army posts the idle vagabond he is to-day.

There are some civilized tribes of Indians, known as the Yumas, Pimas, and others, living on the Colorado and the Gila rivers, in Arizona. In 1849 and several years afterwards, after gold had been discovered in California, many immigrant trains crossed the great plains through Arizona Territory. These Indians were then living there cultivating the soil, using the waters of the rivers for that purpose. They generously supplied these passing immigrants with the necessaries of life, and those of the survivors who are living to-day testify that had it not been for these friendly Indians they would have perished in that great desert. These Indians were then and have always remained the friends of the white man.

The Gila and the Salt rivers have had so much of their water diverted from the lower streams, where the Yumas and Pimas live, that these Indians now have no water with which to raise their crops; they are in poverty, and many of them have died from starvation. They are in a very sad condition, because they do not have the water that should flow down these streams; it has been used by white men living near the heads of these streams. We should build reservoirs on these rivers to supply these Indians with water for irrigation purposes. Justice, humanity, and gratitude alike demand that we should thus aid these helpless and wronged people.

Mr. Chairman, a similar condition exists with reference to the Rio Grande River. That river rises in the Rocky Mountains in Colorado and flows through New Mexico, and forms the boundary between Texas and Mexico. Its waters have been used by the Mexicans and Texans living along its bank for hundreds of years, but in recent years its water has been diverted from its use for purposes of irrigation in Texas and Mexico by citizens of Colorado and New Mexico who have built dams and irrigation ditches, taking all of the water out of the river in the summer, and to-day thousands of magnificent farms, orchards, vineyards, and gardens in Texas and Mexico have been destroyed entirely for want of water. This scene of desolation and consequent destruction extends from El Paso down to the mouth of the Conchos River, a distance of over 200 miles.

The people of Mexico and Texas are alike badly injured. Mexico is our near neighbor and friend. She claims that she is greatly damaged by the diverting of the water of the Rio Grande from her. She has filed claims for these damages against our Government for probably $20,000,000. The State of Texas is also injured by reason of the same fact and to the same effect. In June and July, when it is absolutely essential to have water for irrigation purposes, we find that Colorado and New Mexico have taken all the water from the river. By building a large reservoir across the river a few miles above El Paso, at a very convenient point, the storm waters of the spring can be impounded and a large lake formed; the water can pass through from the lake into the irrigation ditches, so that Texas and Mexico can be fully supplied with water in the future. If our Government will build this dam and give Mexico one-half of the water it impounds, Mexico will relinquish her claim for damages against us.

The Government should come to the aid of these suffering people. There should be a law passed by Congress equitably distributing the water of this river. It is the only river in the United States forming a water boundary, and there is no danger in Congress voting money to build this reservoir, for it can not be a precedent, as there never can be a similar case, for the reason that we have no other international river boundary. Instead of spending millions of money beyond the seas in subjugating alien races, we should use it in building an international dam at El Paso and in the irrigation and development of this our own country. The man that does not provide for his own household is said to be an infidel; and we are told that charity should begin at home. Then let us first do justice to our friendly neighbor, Mexico, by replacing the water our people have taken from the Rio Grande River. We can do this by building the international dam at El Paso. Humanity demands that we furnish water for irrigation purposes to the Yumas and Pimas, the friendly Indians that kept our people from starving to death on the deserts of southern California and Arizona in years gone bye.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not have much to say about the pending bill, further than that I am satisfied the committee has brought in a bill which I can support, but I shall direct my remarks in answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COONEY]. In doing so I shall not undertake to follow that gentleman through his beautiful historical speech on the "Decline and fall of the Roman Empire" nor his story of Roman invasion and aggression. Nor shall I attempt to answer his philippic against "imperialism" generally. I shall not even stop to join with him in deploring the "decay of the Monroe doctrine" nor join with him in comparing very favorably the "statesmanship" of Aguinaldo with that of President McKinley.

I will not join issue with the gentleman from Missouri on that question, although it would be a pleasant oratorical exercise to take up the question he discusses about the "fogs of manifest destiny and dreams of empire which are abroad in this land," but shall address my remarks to the proposition which is before this House, upon which every member ought to stand by the policy of the present Administration toward our new possessions. It is to that subject I shall direct my remarks during the few brief moments which have been allotted to me.

Mr. Chairman, a great question is rising before this Congress, the Administration, and the American people; bills and resolutions relating to it have been presented in the Senate and House, and a special committee has been raised in the House. Much time has been spent in hearings before that committee. The newspapers of the country are every day discussing the subject, and opinion is rapidly being crystallized, but as yet not a word has been heard in this Chamber on this subject. I allude to the question of the status of the new possessions and people acquired by the United States under the treaty of Paris, at the close of the Spanish war, and the policy of Congress toward those possessions and those people.

I am impelled to bring this matter before the House because I know that the earliest possible action of Congress is necessary to relieve the people of Puerto Rico from a commercial and business situation most deplorable.

Delegations are coming, purporting to represent the Puerto Ricans, and are presenting their views before the President and the Secretary of War and the Insular Committee. The special commissioner for the United States to Puerto Rico, under appointment of the President to investigate the civil, industrial, social, and financial conditions of the island, has made his report, which contains a large amount of valuable information and many recommendations as to the policy of creating a form of government for this island. This report recommends, among other things, that the Constitution and laws of the United States be extended to Puerto Rico, and that a territorial form of government similar to that established in Oklahoma be provided; that the legislative power shall be extended to all the rightful subjects of legislation, including regulations for the exercise of the elective franchise; that the legal voters of the island be permitted to elect a delegate to Congress; that a commission be appointed by the President to revise the codes; that the jury system be adopted; that the patent and banking laws of the United States be extended to the island, and among other regulations, that currency, education, etc., be legislated upon.

In the remarks which I now submit to the House I desire to impress upon the House my opinion that most of these wholesome regulations are within the purview of the plan which I shall advocate.

I have waited many days for an opportunity, in Committee of the Whole, to submit my views to the House, but have not been able to do so up to the present time. In the meantime, to my knowledge, members of this House have been waiting for some expression upon this floor, from which at least a start could be made in the discussion of this interesting subject; and on this occasion it is my purpose to state, with as great brevity as the subject admits, my own opinions, gathered from personal observation of affairs in Puerto Rico. In doing so, I do not speak by authority, nor as the exponent of the views or policy of any branch or officer of the Government, nor do I claim to speak for the political party to which I belong. The question involved is not yet a party question. The views which a man may entertain are not therefore a test of his politics. My object is to serve the best interests of the people of Puerto Rico according to my understanding, while at the same time endeavoring to keep in view the interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I am mindful of that unwritten rule of the House which suggests that the new member maintain silence during debates over great questions as they proceed in his admiring presence, and I would not attempt to break over this sometimes wholesome rule were it not for the fact that the pending question of civil government for Puerto Rico is a comparatively new one in the field of Congressional legislation.

This measure is brought here by the suggestion of the President in his message to Congress. Among other things the President says:

> When peace shall be restored it will be the duty of Congress to construct a plan of government which shall establish and maintain freedom and order and peace. There is no reason why steps should not be taken from time to time to inaugurate governments essentially popular in their form, as fast as territory is held and controlled by our troops. To this end I am considering the advisability of the return of this commission, or such of the members thereof as can be secured, to aid the existing authorities and facilitate this work throughout the islands. Until Congress shall have made known the formal expression of its will, I shall use the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes to uphold the sovereignty of the United States in those distant islands as in all places where our flag floats.

Speaking especially of Puerto Rico, the President says:

> It is desirable that the government of the island under the law of belligerent right, now maintained through the executive department, should be superseded by an administration entirely civil in its nature. For present purposes I recommend that Congress pass a law which shall provide for the appointment by the President, subject to the confirmation by the Senate, of a governor and such other officers as the general administration of the island may require, and that for legislative purposes upon subjects of local nature, not partaking of a Federal character, a legislative council, composed partly of Puerto Ricans and partly of citizens of the United States, shall be nominated and appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, their acts to be subject to the approval of Congress or the President prior to going into effect.

In the municipalities and other local subdivisions I recommend that the principle of local self-government be applied at once, so as to enable the intelligent citizens of the island to participate in their government and to learn by practical experience the duties and requirements of a self-contained and self-governing people. I have not thought it wise to commit the entire government of the island to officers selected by the people, because I doubt whether in habits, training, and experience they are such as to fit them to exercise at once so large a degree of self-government; but it is my judgment and expectation that they will soon arrive at an attainment of experience and wisdom and self-control that will justify conferring upon them a much larger participation in the choice of their insular officers.

The fundamental requirement for these people, as for all people, is education. In the introduction of modern educational methods, care, however, must be exercised that changes be not made too abruptly and that the history and radical peculiarities shall be given due weight. Systems of education in these new possessions founded upon common-sense methods, adapted to existing conditions and looking to the future moral and industrial advancement of the people, will commend to them in a peculiarly effective manner the blessings of free government.

Thus has the President remitted to Congress the pending problem of governing Puerto Rico, and the principal feature of his suggestions regarding this island seems to be that the present military government should be superceded by a temporary civil government, under a governor to be appointed by the President, and such officers as the general administration of affairs may require.

In view of these suggestions it seems to me to be the duty of any member who has knowledge of the situation in Puerto Rico to frankly state his views to the House and to give the sources of his knowledge. I make bold to say here that no man can form an accurate or reliable opinion upon the political, moral, educational, or social conditions of the people of Puerto Rico solely from reading newspapers, magazines, and other contemporary literature.

The well-written newspaper correspondence may give a little light to the earnest inquirer, but the beautifully illustrated articles in the magazines are very deceptive. The finest pictures which art can produce do not show the density of ignorance which prevails so universally among the people there. They do not show the fact that 85 to 90 per cent of these people can not read or write. I have been among these people. I have seen them in their humble houses and in the fields of their labor. I have seen them in their poor places of business and in their seatless churches, and believe that I know something more of them than can be learned at second hand from the best literature furnished by the cursory travelers in the island.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman whether upon the ratification of the treaty between this country and Spain terminating the Spanish war, it was not the constitutional prerogative of the President of the United States to issue a proclamation extending all the laws of the United States to the new territory of Puerto Rico?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no question in my mind about that. I have covered that fully in the remarks which I have prepared. The gentleman will get a full answer to that question as I go along.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. If the President of the United States had that power under the Constitution, why is any Congressional action necessary to bring them under the laws of the United States?

Mr. WEEKS. I will cover that fully in the remarks which I am about to make.

I went to Puerto from a sense of duty to myself and the country, and after a careful observation became thoroughly convinced that those people are not prepared for self-government. I am firmly of the opinion that they are not prepared to be vested with the franchise of American citizenship. Imagine, if you please, any State in the Union peopled with a mass of ignorance so dense and universal as exists in Puerto Rico. Reverse the situation in any of the great States of the Union and place there a population 85 or 90 per cent of whom are unable to read, and the picture would appall the most casual thinker in this House.

With all the illiteracy brought here by immigration, we have such a vast preponderance of intelligence among our people that self-government is safe and secure. But reverse the figures and anarchy and misgovernment would certainly follow.

The President has remitted to this Congress the task of fixing the status of the people and the form of the government in Puerto Rico. Instead of arrogating to himself, as he might have done under the military authority residing in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the Republic—instead of accepting the vast powers involved in such action, the President has, with the utmost frankness, said to the people through this House and the Senate that he is ready now to accept the directions and instructions of the people's representatives.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the people of Puerto Rico are less prepared for self-government than the people of the Spanish-American states were when the Monroe doctrine was promulgated?

Mr. WEEKS. I was not there at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if, from general information and the history of those times, he thinks that these people were less prepared?

Mr. WEEKS. I have the information, and will answer the gentleman if he will give me time to get to it in the regular course of my remarks.

I hope Congress will not too readily accept this action as their opportunity to go into general legislation for Puerto Rico in formulating by law a civil government for that island, but that it will with equal frankness recognize the situation and return to the President its commission to deal with the whole subject as he is now doing until the time for Congressional action arrives.

The status of Puerto Rico is not that of a Territory; it is not that of a State. Its people are not citizens of the United States. At the same time it is not a foreign country nor are its people absolutely aliens. It is a piece of property or territory captured in war and now in the possession and custody of the Army of the United States.

The Constitution, Article IV, section 3, gives Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and until Congress shall assume to legislate, this territory or property remains in the hands of the military arm of the Government, under the control of the President. In this fashion it has remained for over one year (since the 18th of October, 1898), and during that time a military government has discharged the functions of civil government in all its branches on the island.

The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, had the power to and did establish a civil or provisional government, which was a military government so far as the force and power of sovereignty goes, but which was a civil government so far as all the functions of civil administration were concerned.

To show what kind of government has been furnished, I beg the privilege of quoting from my own letters, written while in the island last October:

On October 18, 1898, the Spanish flag was hauled down and the American flag raised over the official palace, and the sovereignty of Spain, which had been supreme in this island for four hundred years, ceased, and the sovereignty of the United States took its place.

I realize the effect of the change upon the people of Puerto Rico. In this city the change is too manifest to escape the most casual observation. The streets of San Juan have undergone a marvelous change. Under Spanish rule they were filthy, the lack of proper street cleaning rendering the city foul beyond description. Now the streets are clean and the air fairly sweet and healthful. The American authorities have caused public and private buildings to be cleansed. A vast amount of plumbing and sewering has been done, and San Juan will to-day compare in this respect with the average city in the United States. The great hospitals, barracks, and other government buildings and places have been provided with bath tubs, closets, shower baths, lavatories, etc., with the utmost liberality, thereby rendering life in this hot city endurable and comfortable. The water supply is brought from about 6 miles away and is very abundant and pure. It is one of the most agreeable of the provisions introduced by the Americans for the health and comfort of the city, and will render San Juan a healthy residence city. One can imagine what a boon is thus conferred when we realize that the temperature here scarcely ever goes below 80°, but remains, summer and winter, near that unvarying point. Our soldiers, both sick and well, appreciate this provision for their health and comfort most keenly.

The insular officials are a treasurer of the island, an auditor, a collector of customs, with deputies at Ponce, Arroyo, Mayaguez, Arecibo, Humacao, Aguadilla, and Vieques. Internal-revenue officers are also located at the same points. There is also a judicial board established by general orders of the department, which has charge of the courts and administration of justice. There is also a board of health, a United States provisional court, and a board of charities, a board of prison control, a board of education, and also a postal department, with 76 post-offices on the island; also a board of public works and an advisory board in insular policy and affairs. There is an insular police; also municipal police and an inspector of jails.

These details show to what extent order has been brought out of chaos that was left by the war. The cities are as well governed as the cities in the United States, and the country is free from lawlessness, and peace and good order reign as completely here as in any State in the Union. Having visited the penitentiary, I can certify that its cleanliness and sanitary condition is as good as any prison I ever visited. There are 375 convicts in this penitentiary, almost all confined on conviction of homicidal charges, with some convicted of lesser grades of crime.

On the occasion of my visit the prisoners not out "pounding stone" were marshaled for my inspection. I passed down before the double file of men—almost all natives—and a hard-favored lot they were. But they were under such surveillance and discipline that their looks and demeanor were softened, and one could willingly forget the villainy and ferocity which was the offspring of ignorance, bigotry, and their crude notions of justice and the value of human life. The Americans have cleaned up this prison and eliminated the horrors of bad ventilation, dampness, darkness, and filth which characterized Spanish rule there.

The organization of a provisional court of the United States for the island is one of the accomplished facts most creditable to the military government there. It was created by a military order, its jurisdiction clearly defined, and extends to all cases, civil and commercial, which would be cognizable by a circuit or district court of the United States, and to all common-law offenses, with certain restrictions specified. The decisions of the court and its procedure follow the principles of the common law and equity as interpreted by the courts of the United States, and conform as nearly as may be to the rules followed by the Federal courts.

The court has its officers and judges, the same as the courts in the States, and all its business and its rules and proceedings are in the English language.

At this point I reluctantly dissent from the views of some advisers of the President regarding the system of jurisprudence adopted by the people of this island, whom the President describes as "competent lawyers who are thoroughly familiar with it, and who advise that the system is thoroughly modern and scientific, so far as it relates to internal business, trade, production, and private right in general." It is my judgment, based upon information which I consider thoroughly reliable, that the old Spanish laws found in force in Puerto Rico, and yet unrepealed, are the most vicious, grinding, and outrageous which have been discovered in modern times, and that the administration of the laws by our Government and courts in the fashion of the Spanish régime would be the greatest scandal and disgrace possible to be conceived.

In my judgment the first, and indeed the immediate, care of the Administration or of Congress, whichever shall act in the matter, should be the speedy overturning of this relic of mediæval laws and the substitution of the principles and practice of the common law and jurisprudence of the United States.

It would be impossible within the limits of a brief address to specify with any detail the bad features which characterize the laws left by Spain in Puerto Rico, and the worse features which characterize their enforcement or administration. A very few particulars will suffice:

Prior to the advent of the Americans the writ of habeas corpus was unknown in Puerto Rico. What horrors were possible under such a condition the imagination can readily depict. Prior to the 18th of October one year ago trial by jury was unknown in Puerto Rico. What outrages upon justice were thus rendered possible can again be imagined.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman states that the writ of habeas corpus and the right of trial by jury obtain there now. How did they get there?

Mr. WEEKS. I will explain that to the gentleman from Tennessee in a moment.

Mr. GAINES. I will agree with you that if they are not there they ought to be there.

Mr. WEEKS. I will give the gentleman the information that he desires before I am through.

Up to this hour no adequate provision has ever been made for recording conveyances of real estate in Puerto Rico. Fancy the confusion possible under such a system.

A base line for surveys of land does not exist.

A will was never probated in a court in this island.

No assessed valuation for purposes of taxation was ever placed on real or personal property. Land was never taxed according to its value. Hence taxation was unjust and cruel, and the poorer classes suffered most.

As I am now advised, only a few of these unjust and wicked features of Spanish law have yet been abandoned or changed, and the great bulk of these most ancient and obsolete features are yet the law of the land there, to be administered by courts under the sovereignty of the United States. In my humble judgment these are not "thoroughly modern and scientific laws, so far as they relate to matters of internal business, trade, production, or social or private right in general." And whether the government for Puerto Rico, soon to be decided upon and established, shall be civil or military, I would lift my voice for speedy action as a measure of justice and necessity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I object, unless it comes out of the other side's time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If I may be permitted, I want to say that my colleague has made a careful study of this subject and I think he ought to be allowed to go on.

Mr. LITTLE. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should have all the time he wishes if it comes out of the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. As the request is put to the committee it would not come out of the time of either, but out of the general debate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will not object.

Mr. LITTLE. I can not yield.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest to the gentleman that if he would ask unanimous consent that his colleague be allowed fifteen minutes and fifteen minutes be allowed on the other side there would be no objection.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will make the request in the form suggested by the gentleman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended fifteen minutes, and that the time of some gentleman on the other side of the House, not yet announced, be also extended fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEEKS. In this business we need not regard the traditions of the "conquered people." As a matter of fact, they have no traditions. We have taken these people at the end of four hundred years of absolute failure on the part of Spain in government, religion, morals, and education. We have a nation of children, who must be taught either the English or Spanish language in the schools and in business, in the courts and in politics and government, and we may as well begin teaching them English now as to wait twenty-five or fifty years to do it.

The President advises the establishment of a school system in Puerto Rico. One of the proudest things to recall in connection with our conquest there is that, whereas when we took possession there was not a schoolhouse on the entire island, already schools have been established, schoolhouses are being built, and the task of giving an education to the children of Puerto Rico has been entered upon in a most thorough and businesslike way.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Are those public schools?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir. We have nearly 700 schools running under military or what by some might be called "imperialistic government." I hold in my hand a letter which I received this morning from the president of the insular board of education of Puerto Rico, in which he uses this language:

THE PUERTO RICO BOARD OF EDUCATION, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
San Juan, P. R., January 17, 1900.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to thank you for the copy of the Port Huron Times of December 16, containing your excellent article upon the school system of Puerto Rico.

We appreciate much the intelligent consideration that Puerto Rican affairs have received at your hands. Kindly command our services in case you should at any time desire further information of any character pertaining to the work in Puerto Rico.

Very respectfully,
VICTOR S. CLARK,
President Insular Board of Education.

Hon. EDGAR WEEKS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do they teach the English language in those schools?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir; they teach the English language now. Formerly the schools in Puerto Rico, under Spanish administration, had no books. They had nothing but blackboards, and the teaching was all object teaching. The teacher would talk and the children would play or go to sleep, and sometimes the teacher would go to sleep. But I can not stop here to describe the wretched system of schools which existed in Puerto Rico before the Americans set up American schools upon that island.

But in all the calculations which we make it is a sad truth that we shall be compelled to eliminate from our consideration the mass of the present adult population of the island. It is utterly impossible to educate the present generation, and if we succeed with the rising generation we shall far outstrip our own efforts in the same direction in other regions where the United States has had full opportunity for over fifty years, with a population better prepared than the Puerto Rican to receive the elements of American education and citizenship.

I feel sure that these suggestions will not be taken unkindly, even by the small minority of the people of Puerto Rico which constitutes the educated and intelligent class, because they are the plain, unvarnished facts in the case, and I stand here to urge that Congress do not now legislate for the government of Puerto Rico, but that it authorize the President to continue the military government there, which shall exercise the fullest functions of a civil government.

The necessity for a stable government and permanency in commercial, monetary, and political matters is such that there should be no delay. Using the language of the insular commission on this subject:

So far Puerto Rico has gained nothing by belonging to the United States. She is still under the old laws, now made our own, with few modifications, and under the same oppressions. She has lost the Spanish markets for her crops, and has been excluded from our own. She is burdened to-day with oppressive taxation, and onerous, unnecessary, and exorbitant salaries are paid the horde of officeholders playing at running a government, American in form, under Spanish laws, and with officers trained in Spanish diplomacy and intrigue. Hence we may say there is pressing military necessity and a political necessity for immediate action on all possible reforms in government and administration.

Mr. Chairman, I now approach a branch of the subject in regard to which I suppose I should do as they used to do in the olden times when they had the "trial by fire," when a man was obliged to walk around among red-hot plowshares barefooted.

Mr. GAINES. I should like the gentleman to answer the question how the right of the writ of habeas corpus and the right of trial by jury or any other fundamental right which we enjoy in this country have gone down to Puerto Rico?

Mr. WEEKS. Those rights have been inaugurated by order of the military government.

Mr. GAINES. Then civil trials are carried on by military authority?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir; that is right.

Mr. GAINES. Then the Constitution has not gone there at all?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed in my own way, I will cover his points.

Mr. GAINES. I should be glad to have my question answered before the gentleman gets through.

Mr. WEEKS. I will cover all that if the gentleman will have patience.

Mr. GAINES. I hope the gentleman will get to my question soon.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to answer the gentleman now, but I can not at this point take the time.

Mr. Chairman, the American people do not take kindly to "military government," but until Congress shall act in the matter there is no other form possible for Puerto Rico. In other words, there is no government possible unless it be either a military or a civil government, and the moment civil government is established military government is gone.

A MEMBER. Which do you favor?

Mr. WEEKS. I will tell the gentleman if he will have patience.

While I favor the continuance of the present form of government there, I would urge that every possible feature of civil government should be maintained, especially in the administration of such laws as the President may, in his wisdom, recommend. I would not recommend immediately investing in the people there the franchise of citizenship or the right to vote. Just and good government can be maintained there without either until such time as, through education and experience, familiarity with American ideas shall be obtained by the inhabitants. Far better so than the frequent revolutions and bloodshed which have characterized the Latin and native and mixed races of Central and South America and certain West India islands for hundreds of years. With the steady hand of the American Government in control, the people will eventually discover where the path of peace, order, education, obedience to law, and the will of the majority will place them, and in the fullness of time the people of Puerto Rico will become so Americanized as to make good citizens and the fair island become the real gem of the Antilles.

There is precedent for all this. When civil government was set up in California after the cession of that territory by Mexico this course was adopted; it received the approval of the Federal courts, and the civil administration by the military authority was accepted. The same difficulty was experienced for a long time in California that confronts us in Puerto Rico to-day. A large majority of the people spoke a foreign language, were ignorant of English, and densely ignorant of those principles of republican government which alone will be sanctioned when civil government shall be finally established.

A strong argument for the continuation of the military government in Puerto Rico is the organization of political parties there just prior to the recent municipal elections. I happened to be there during those elections. I attended the polls and saw and talked with the officers superintending the election. So I know something about this matter from personal observation. The two parties put forth pronunciamentos, or platforms. The platforms were wide in their scope, one declaring for an insular republic, the integral sovereignties of which should be Cuba, Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Puerto Rico, and the other for American money, free suffrage, or popular ballot, free trade with the United States, and early admission to the American Union as a State. And upon these platforms the parties went into the campaign for the election of alcaldes, constables, and other mere municipal officers.

The spectacle of these elections was not encouraging. Riot and disorder and bloodshed occurred in a few places, and the mob of ignorant "electors" raged through the streets shouting "death to this one," "down with that one." So repulsive was this exhibition that the present military governor issued an order suppressing such demonstrations and threatened to proclaim martial law in case such proceedings were repeated. Peace and order followed this exercise of power by the governor, thus furnishing strong argument in favor of a continuance of military government there.

The political party which best commends itself to American sympathy in Puerto Rico declared in its platform as follows:

> We believe that the people of Puerto Rico could be trusted with the civil government of the island; but as that authority only emanates from the Congress of the United States, it is but our duty to await their action. While under military government, awaiting action by Congress, we desire that all civil offices should be filled by men capable, honest, and of unquestioned loyalty to the Government of the United States, and disposed to act singly for the best interest of this island and our common country without distinction, thereby affording us an opportunity to demonstrate our fitness for self-government with all the burdens and responsibilities which it entails, and which will hasten the day when our island will have a place among the States of the Union.

Before Mr. WEEKS had concluded his remarks,

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent that I may print the rest of my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES. I certainly do not object, and I shall be delighted if the gentleman in extending his remarks will answer my question.

Mr. WEEKS. I think I shall do so.

This seems to demonstrate that the best intelligence of Puerto Rico declares for the plan of government which I am urging as the most wholesome for that island.

From my own observations I am fully persuaded that the mass of the people of Puerto Rico are incapable of self-government and unprepared for the duties of citizenship or the exercise of the elective franchise. They lack intelligence, education, and patriotism, three things essential to self-government. I repeat here the language of General Ludlow, in a recent utterance, speaking of the Cubans in this same connection:

> I apprehend it will be a long term of guardianship. At present illiteracy will reach 80 per cent of the people. To grant them universal suffrage would be to undo all the good work which has been done by the Government.

At this point I take the liberty to make a quotation from a letter written by a Puerto Rican of apparent intelligence and education, published in the New York Sun of January 21.

Speaking of the capacity for self-government of the Puerto Rican people, he says:

> But, notwithstanding this, the great mass of the people of every degree are loyal to us. They are well disposed and anxious to become good American citizens, on a level with ourselves, enjoying all our privileges. With the exercise of patience, forbearance, and wisdom this laudable ambition may in time be realized, though at present, as a people, they are not fitted for self-government, and the attempt of demagogues to lead them into a demand for a Territorial organization, with a legislature of their own, is placing them at a great disadvantage, the same as is done in attempting to compel a child to run before it has learned to stand alone. Governor-General Davis has wisely given them an opportunity to demonstrate their quality as citizens by authorizing them to hold elections for municipal officers. He has also appointed natives to important offices.
> The results have been so unsatisfactory in so many instances that those best acquainted with the facts have been led to declare most positively that Puerto Ricans, as yet, are incapable of self-government, and they sustain the declaration with ample proof. The governor-general was even compelled to issue a proclamation threatening to supersede the civil with the military authority in the disturbed districts if peace was not restored at once. That proclamation had a happy effect. The necessity for it shows the mischief that may be done by an active minority, badly led, and also that the hand of power is still needed there.
> But time and experience will cure all this. It will be slow, tedious work, and must be done by Puerto Ricans themselves, with our assistance, and they will not be free until, by education under competent supervision, they have freed themselves from the ignorance and superstition that has so long held them in bondage, as well as from the traditions of the Spanish oligarchy that still cling to too many of them, the evidence of which we see in the profuse display of Spanish flags on every fête day in San Juan. It is due to the rest of the island, however, to say that this flag is not often seen elsewhere. They do not seem to be aware that every such display postpones the day when the island will have Territorial government.

The present military government has already accomplished great good for these people. Peace and order reign in all the island. Life and property are as safe as in any State in the Union. I traveled across the island, over mountains, through valleys, and through populated towns, wholly unarmed and without thought of personal danger, going about day or night, in country or city, just as one would in the most peaceful neighborhood of the States. The present government has brought to the people of Puerto Rico but little benefit, however, because the Spanish laws and ancient customs have been suffered to continue and because the exactions of officials under Spanish laws are continued under American administration under the plea that the law warrants these exactions. Instances of this state of things can be readily cited, and it is a weak spot in our administration there that these things have not been corrected by military order.

But the hesitation of our military government in dealing with these scandals has arisen from the doubt as to the immediate future there. The well-known antipathy of a great many Americans to what they are pleased to call "militarism" has had some influence in this matter; but once let Congress declare that the present form of military government must continue in Puerto Rico, and all these abuses will, no doubt, be promptly corrected. We must not pause out of respect for ancient usages. If a thing is oppressive or exacting, root it out at once. I speak particularly of the system of conveyancing, which permits a notary to exact large commissions on the value of realty conveyed as his fee for drawing up the papers; and also the exaction of a monstrous fee by this same official for furnishing a copy of the conveyance. And all this comes from the ridiculous fact that conveyances are not recorded and no provision made for such records, only copies being recorded, and they at large expense.

The same applies to the law of wills. I am informed that no will was ever regularly probated in Puerto Rico before a court having jurisdiction of such matters, because there is not now and never was such a court. The notary has the custody of the wills which he has drawn, and his bare production of such will is, in Puerto Rico, its probate. Changes have been made in the customs laws which have brought relief, but other radical changes must be made before justice is done to those people. The writ of habeas corpus has been introduced, and monstrous abuses and crimes against the liberty of the Puerto Rican have been abated, but with the present law, authorizing any judge to imprison at his discretion, the writ as now provided for is half paralyzed.

Juries are now provided for, and this bulwark of civil liberty is now known for the first time in this island, but only in the provisional court of the United States.

The petty exactions and lawless methods under the guise and pretense of custom by the lesser courts on the island have been only partly corrected, by placing the proceedings of all the courts under the general supervision and control of the provisional court of the United States, which holds its terms at San Juan, Mayaguez, Ponce, and one or two other cities.

The necessity for speedy, I may say immediate, reform in many particulars is pressing, and if Congress will promptly resolve to rely on the authority of the President and the military on the island, speedy relief will follow.

I have given only a portion of the reasons why I advocate a continuance of the military government of Puerto Rico. I believe the time is not yet ripe for the mass of the people of that island to be trusted with self-government, with citizenship, or with the exercise of the elective franchise, and I believe that the day we change the form of government there, if done now, will be a day of disaster for Puerto Rico.

One of the disasters which might follow is intimated in the following extract from a letter dated San Juan, Puerto Rico, January 13, 1900:

> May I call your attention to the article of Mr. George Keenen, recently published in the Outlook, on the "Characteristics of the Cubans." In that article Dr. Keenen remarks that the Cubans will never be able to take care of themselves from a sanitary standpoint, and that that work must always remain in the hands of the Americans. May I call your attention to the fact that I believe what is true of Cuba in this respect is true of Puerto Rico and the other Spanish islands we have recently acquired. If the people of the United States wish smallpox, yellow fever, leprosy, elephantiasis, and other horrible diseases to continue here and to be carried to the States, they have only to turn over sanitary matters to these happy-go-lucky people, who care nothing whatever for disease, and who make extremely slight efforts to check its ravages. This island, for instance, under the Spanish Government always had yellow fever, and as many as 20,000 people have died in a single year from smallpox. Now we have smallpox absolutely under control, and did not have a single case of yellow fever this past season.
>
> These islands are naturally healthful. The air is pure and wholesome. The heat is a little greater than would please a Northerner. These diseases have prevailed and have been alarming to Americans and Europeans, but arise wholly from the abominable filth and careless habits of the people.
>
> Very respectfully,
>
> GEO. G. GROFF,
> Secretary Superior Board of Health, etc.

A military government can be so constituted as to meet all the emergencies and demands which can properly be made upon a civil administration. A system of education; a system of taxes based on assessment of property; a readjustment of our tariff to suit the necessities and conditions there; a code of civil and criminal law; habeas corpus; trial by jury where it is possible; highways and bridges; franchises to railway and electric-motor companies; support of the poor; regulation of marriage; recording real estate deeds and mortgages; prevention of contagious diseases; regulation of liquor traffic, and all subjects of ordinary municipal and State legislation could be provided for, the peace maintained, and civil and religious liberty protected under the military government as well as under a civil government. A code covering all of these subjects has been prepared by the insular commission, but not yet printed or reported to Congress.

From the report of the judge-advocate of the Department of Puerto Rico I take the following extract, showing the scope and jurisdiction exercised over civil affairs by the present military government:

> The following partial statement of subjects pertaining to governmental reforms and reconstruction of governmental administration which have been referred to this office for investigation and report, and upon which decisions and opinions have been rendered or new laws framed, will suggest in some degree the magnitude of the work in hand:
>
> Military commissions; marriage and divorce laws; attachments on property; arrest and conviction of bandits; private and municipal bonds; cases in bankruptcy; opposition by clergy to certain burials in consecrated cemeteries; concessions; commissions levied by banking institutions upon certain drafts and checks; jails and prisoners; reforms in judicial procedure; renunciation of foreign citizenship by public officials; aliens' petitions to make declaration of intention to become citizens of the United States; aliens' applications for enlistment in Puerto Rico battalion; importation of contract labor and immigration laws; validity of contracts between clergy and state executed under former régime; claims against the state by church and clergy; miscellaneous claims against the state; rights of foreign lawyers to practice their profession; abrogation of certain dues and fees exacted by former régime; matters of public education; liberty of the press and abuse thereof; court physicians and jail chaplains; garnishment of certain salaries; collection of debts; efficiency of police, abuse of authority by police; protests against public nuisances and vices; sedition; criminal libel; importers' licenses; creation of United States provisional court; property titles; public lands; regulation of judicial costs; erection of public buildings; office rights purchased under Spanish Government; notarial fees; negotiable instruments; jurisdiction of local courts; abolishment of certain courts; registration of legal instruments; municipal elections; taxation; frauds and misuse of public funds; testimony; appointment of United States provisional court commissioners; civil reforms, etc.
> The oath of allegiance required of all pilots and light-house keepers and the oaths of office to the various public officials to the number of several hundred were also administered by the judge-advocate of the department.

The President has simply performed his duty up to the present hour in caring for the public domain and preserving the peace, and he now turns to Congress for its approval and directions.

Subject to climatic conditions and other considerations, there should be taken up the questions in that island relating to labor, wages, finance, and education, and considered in their order. They should be considered and treated according to the unalterable conditions which exist there. Rules which would be applicable to colder zones will not apply there, and that which we might fancy or wish was the case we can not force or compel against the irrevocable and inevitable.

My observations among the educated natives, the business men, and those who have the substantial interests of Puerto Rico at heart lead me to believe that they most earnestly and cordially commend the present government in that island. They concede the great benefits already conferred, and the great promise of the future, from a wise, strong, and intelligent administration, and express the belief that the welfare and prosperity of all classes in the island depend upon the continuance there of the military government for an indefinite period. They concede that it would prove disastrous to those interests if the affairs of insular government should, through a mistaken policy, fall into the control of the uneducated masses under the leadership of scheming and unscrupulous local politicians.

The revenues of the island soon will be ample for all the expenses of the government, and under American administration these revenues will be honestly collected and honestly expended, so that the island and its people will get the benefit, not the Spanish monarchy and a horde of dishonest officials.

With the reforms which I have suggested we shall soon place this new and beautiful possession on a self-sustaining basis, and, beside rescuing a million of people from the cruel oppression of hundreds of years, under which they deteriorated and suffered, we shall educate and ennoble the people and add to our national possessions the key to the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea, and a naval station from which we can dominate those regions, protect our national interests in the Nicaragua canal, and secure ourselves in a coigne of international advantage valuable beyond our past conceptions.

A word in regard to the revenues of Puerto Rico. The customs taxes amount to only about $1,000,000 a year. Ground taxes collected on the island reach nearly three and a half millions annually. The export taxes, levied by the municipalities at their own will and pleasure, not limited at all by any general law, amount to a large sum, the precise amount not known.

These taxes are expended mostly for salaries and pensions to officials and ex-officials, and very little goes to the benefit of the people or fund for which they are levied. Hence it is apparent that much greater relief can be afforded Puerto Rico by a wise code of taxation and collection laws, a reduced official force, and honest expenditures, guided by conscientious and faithful American officials, than the total abolition of all indirect taxes by way of customs duties. Customs can be so assessed as to fall mostly on the wealthier classes and consumers of luxuries and those most able to pay, and thus lessen the burdens on the poor in export taxes, taxes on occupations, on rent, and furniture in the homes, as is now the law. The people pay a well-adjusted tariff with less complaint than any other species of tax. Under the laws yet in force in Puerto Rico, notaries public make from ten thousand to fifty thousand dollars a year. Recorders of deeds make an equal sum. These are abuses and fall heavily on everyone who buys or sells land. Many instances can be cited where it cost more to pay these fees for the notaries and recorders than it did to pay for the land purchased.

Taxes are now doubled by law as against nonresident owners of lands. This is un-American and contrary to the ordinary rules of just taxation prevailing generally in the United States.

The Spanish system of laws is founded on wrong ideas, incompatible with free institutions, and, if left as a code or system, will retard all governmental or business progress. Mexico still holds to them, though she has been out from under the Spanish yoke over a generation of time; and it is such systems of jurisprudence prevailing in Spanish-American countries which has for a century blocked the wheels of progress and civilization.

As an example of this proposition, I recall that only a short time ago we read of a wealthy cattle grower of New Mexico who, straying over the line, became involved in a difficulty with Mexicans, was arrested, jailed "incomunicado," kept in a foul prison with insufficient food, denied all access to his friends, spent all his money in trying to free himself, and died from the effects of two years' confinement without trial. In the United States foreigners, however intelligent, must remain here among us, in contact with our free institutions and under our laws, several years before they can be citizens and before they are allowed to sit on juries. Many good people think this is too short a time.

Why, then, is there any haste to extend these privileges to Puerto Ricans, made up of Spaniards and negroes and mixtures of the two, 90 per cent of whom can neither read nor write? Add to this those who own property, and you still have 85 per cent who can neither read nor write or do not own property. If we limit suffrage to the 10 or 15 per cent, you deprive 85 or 90 per cent of the people of a voice and confer the power on the 15 per cent. Of this 15 per cent, over half are the politicians, who would control the other half, and they are educated in Spanish and Spanish laws and ways of government, the corner stone of which is how to help the officeholder and burden the people and hold them in ignorance so as to be more readily controlled. This is all un-American and not a free government.

So far, when called upon to form a law on the American plan, they have failed to show a comprehension of the first principle of justice as we understand it. Take the tax law; it taxes nonresidents just double the resident. Take the so-called marriage law, supposed to give legitimacy to the offspring of consent marriages; it fails to give a scintilla of relief. As to divorce, the laws there provide for divorce against the wife if she is found guilty of adultery, but the husband can not be divorced for adultery by him unless it is proved that his adultery had caused public scandal. The crime may be committed in the presence of his wife; but if it is not public and notorious, the law affords her no redress.

Such a law was promulgated with great acclaim by the secretary of justice as a great American law, and he is regarded as one of the best scholars and lawyers on the island. They also prohibit ex-priests, who have long ago abandoned the church, from marrying the mothers of their children, with whom they live without marriage, because prohibited by this old Spanish law, which we have adopted there. The Church may declare that its priests may not marry; but why should the law do so, and especially after they have renounced allegiance to the church?

The courts, presided over by men graduated in law schools of Spain, are suspected of priestism and bribery, and do not at all possess the confidence of the people. The rich and influential gain their suits. They never had a jury system. If we have a trial by jury there, and these people are called into the jury box (people who have never even dreamed of exercising such a power), what kind of justice can be expected? You have lessened the amount to be paid in bribes and corruption and permitted to remain other influences to secure a verdict.

If by legislation we are going to grant citizenship to those Spaniards and negroes in Puerto Rico, and declare for free trade with the islands, we shall give an argument to our friends the Democrats which they have not now. You will add to this list of opposers the sugar growers, both of corn and beets, the tobacco growers of the country, the fruit growers of California and Florida, who see their business seriously threatened. "Is the island worth the destruction of all these home industries?" they will ask. Is the policy of protection which we have been so long building up for the advantage of our people to be given away by the Republican party?

If we can do away with the prejudice against military government, we have avoided all these evils. Military government may be reduced to the minimum of objection when it is purely civil in form, enforced solely by civilians and not by soldiers, controlled by a full code of laws, and the military held in the background simply as a police force and only to act when called on by civil authorities.

Can not Congress be as wise and unselfish as the President, who has declined to assume or exercise his power, by withholding its right to legislate, and so leave the government in the hands of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. The President has all the power he needs, and could have established this government before Congress met; but he does not seek these extra responsibilities. If Congress chooses to relieve him and take up the burden, it can do so. But if this course is regarded as unwise at this time, the President will then furnish those people with good government, as during the past year he already has done. Let Congress, by resolution or otherwise, decide to leave these people where they are, in this probationary state, and all clamor and dissatisfaction will cease. The President will continue the present wise government, and the people will submit cheerfully to the government so established. And the American interests now agitated by the fear of free trade with the little island of Puerto Rico will receive assurance that the Republican policy of protection will not be abandoned or qualified.

It is possible for this Congress to put this matter at rest for five or ten years, at least, so as not to trouble future Congresses. If this Congress declares "the inhabitants of our newly acquired islands to be citizens and the islands integral parts of the Union," either directly or indirectly, that is the end of it, and no future Congress can change it. But if Congress declares that for five or ten years the islands are merely dependencies, under control of the United States military authority, and that at the end of that time Congress will fix their civil rights and political status, that would exhaust the power until the expiration of the period. In any event, it would be improbable that a future Congress would change it unless there was very good reason for doing so.

It is with some hesitation that I have spoken so plainly on the recommendation of free trade with Puerto Rico. Already this suggestion has aroused opposition, as detrimental to our tobacco and cigar manufacturing interests, in which millions of American capital is successfully embarked. Our woolgrowing and manufacturing interests are also aroused, while the united forces of our fruit-growing and beet-sugar interests are besieging us on this floor to ward off the threatened danger that is to come from free trade with Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. It is maintained that free trade with these islands would seriously impair all these great interests, and messages and letters are being received by Congressmen from all the wool and tobacco growing States imploring the Representatives to prevent the consummation of this suggestion.

Many Republicans, strong in their loyalty to the doctrine of protection to American industries, are not hesitating in the expression of opposition to opening the door of free trade, even in a limited way. They urge that free trade with Puerto Rico must come, when it does come, in a constitutional way, after the island becomes a constituent part of the Republic, not while it remains a dependency, and that a long time should elapse, even in this view of the case, to allow American industries ample time to adjust themselves to the new conditions which free trade with the colonies will bring.

I do not suggest these things in a spirit of opposition, but with the fervent desire that whatever is done in the House or elsewhere will be done with a full knowledge of the vastness of the interests involved, with a full realization of the effects of hasty or immature action.

Since the preparation of the notes from which I am speaking the Governor-General of Puerto Rico, Gen. George W. Davis, has been summoned to Washington by the President, and has been before the Insular Committee of the House, and I am proud to say almost every proposition which I have laid down was most fully emphasized by him. The committee will not fail to sustain me in this claim, and after the clear, candid, and convincing statement of General Davis it seems to me that but one course lies before the committee, and that is to recommend that Congress do not set up a civil government in Puerto Rico, but that the President be left to govern there by military authority for an indefinite period.

While we are discussing these questions relative to the island of Puerto Rico, why not turn to Cuba for a brilliant example of the kind of government which I am urging for its neighboring isle? The splendid administration of General Wood, from the time he began the occupation of Santiago until this hour, furnishes the most cogent argument for us here. He is dealing with a people similar in habit, in social, moral, religious, educational, and political condition—a people speaking the same language, possessing the same defects, lacking the same qualities as the men of Puerto Rico; and day by day the American newspapers are filled with praise for the conditions enforced in Cuba by General Wood. The problem is the same almost in both these islands, so far as the present condition is concerned, and the same firm hand of military government which is educating the Cuban people and preparing them for self-government is needed in Puerto Rico.

When the United States purchased from France the territory of Louisiana, in April, 1803, no war existed there, yet the President set up there a military government, which continued for some time, during which time Congress did not feel called upon to even suggest any change, except in October, 1803, when it passed, by large majorities in both Houses, an act containing a grant of plenary authority to the President.

The following is one section of the act:

That until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

From a learned paper which was read before the American Historical Society (see Annual Report American Historical Association, 1898, page 316) by Mr. S. E. Baldwin, a paper written pending the ratification of the recent treaty with Spain, I make the following quotations:

The President is holding these islands during a foreign war with the rights of a military commander in an enemy's country. There is no constitutional objection to the acquisition of any or all of our new possessions, or to subjecting them to a temporary government of military or colonial form.

Until Congress acts, the President can govern our new possessions with no other authority than that with which his great office is clothed by the Constitution in its grant of Executive power.

If the Spanish treaty should be ratified, Congress could replace the temporary government which the President has set up in Puerto Rico by whatever form of administration it may think proper, not inconsistent with the principles and provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and maintain it until the inhabitants may be fit to govern themselves. No fixed limit of time can be assigned for the duration of such a régime. We have held Alaska under such conditions already for thirty years, and she is hardly more deserving of autonomy now than she was when a Russian province.

We have held New Mexico under different forms of administration for nearly fifty years, and the character and traditions and laws of a Latin race are so deeply stamped upon her people and her institutions that no demand of party exigency has been strong enough to secure her admission to the privilege of statehood.

Upon the ratification of the treaty Puerto Rico would become a part of the United States; but our customs laws would not have full operation there until Congress created the necessary collection districts and ports of entry. Until then the temporary government of the President would continue; duties on imports could be lawfully collected by his agents; and whatever courts of a municipal character he may have set up would continue in the discharge of their functions, with the power of life and death.

A port or island like Guam, taken for military or naval purposes, can be permanently kept under military law.

And here such certainty as can be derived from judicial precedent or settled legislative construction and popular acquiescence comes to an end.

How long and with what effect Congress might allow our new possessions to be held under military rule; whether Puerto Rico can be held permanently and avowedly as a colonial dependence; whether they could be given over to their inhabitants; whether all trials for crimes committed there must be by jury; whether in this Republic there can be settled inhabitants of civilized or semicivilized races owing allegiance to the United States alone, but who can be regarded as subjects and not citizens—these are questions not irrevocably settled so far as we can consult the oracles of the past.

In conclusion, I take the liberty to appropriate the main points of an able editorial in a recent issue of the Washington Post, and commend the same to the candid consideration of the House:

Believing that the Constitution of the United States, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, renders it impossible for Congress to legislate for the government of any of the islands acquired by the Paris treaty without thereby making them integral parts of this Republic and conferring citizenship upon such of their inhabitants as might choose to relinquish their allegiance to Spain, the Post has expressed doubts as to the truth of sundry predictions of great activity on the part of the new Congressional Committee on Insular Affairs. Referring to an editorial in the New York Sun relating to the greatness and importance of the work before one of these committees and the honor of an appointment to membership thereof, the Post said that if legislation upon matters appertaining to island governments means that the islands legislated upon are thereby made integral parts of our Republic, and their inhabitants made citizens of the United States, we are confident that the country will be more than willing for this committee to share the leisure of its esteemed contemporary, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

There is not a doubt that "those islands are ours." The title by which we hold them is absolutely flawless. But where is the statesman, where the intelligent, patriotic American who is desirous or willing to have all those islands become parts of our Republic, all their inhabitants our fellow-citizens? Congress can not legislate for aliens. There is no halfway point between the citizen and the foreigner. The colonial plan of Great Britain is barred by our Constitution. The only open door for escape from full recognition of each and all of our new insular acquisitions as parts of our Union is that which President Polk adopted, with the tacit consent and approval of Congress, in governing New Mexico. It was technically a "military government," but military only in name. Judge Curtis refers to that precedent in his Forum article.

He states that when New Mexico passed into the possession of our Army, in 1846, the Mexican officials departed, and all semblance of government simultaneously disappeared. Thereupon General Kearny, the commanding general of the army of occupation, proclaimed himself governor and prepared a full code of laws, civil and criminal; established a new judicial system, with trial courts and appellate courts; prescribed new methods of taxation, and appointed a complete set of officers and judges. He acted with the approval of the President, as Commander in Chief, but without the direct sanction of Congress. The military assumption of civil powers continued nearly five years—long after the war ended, and until Congress considered the people of New Mexico ready for Territorial government. Then an enabling act was passed and a Territorial legislature authorized.

If the new committees can find any middle ground between Executive government and Congressional government, with the result of placing the islands "upon a footing of Territorial wardship," they will confer an inestimable favor on their countrymen. Pending their search for that desideratum, the Post has no doubt that they will move cautiously if they move at all.

If Congress can not legislate for those islands of the Orient without thereby repealing our immigration and tariff laws as relates to them—and this appears to be the exact state of the case—we believe Congress will wait a long time before entering upon such legislation.

From the other end of the Capitol you have heard within a few days, in words of eloquence, the same story of another of our new possessions, where an almost identical race of people have been recently rescued from the rapacity and cruelty of Spain and brought under the benign influence and protection of the American flag. I regret that I lack the art of eloquence to charm and to win your applause, as did the distinguished statesman and orator who addressed the Senate.

It is my lot rather to deal in arguments dressed in the "sober gray" of the English language. But I have endeavored to place before the House the real and actual facts, and to indulge in no fine or fanciful phrases while dealing with this momentous question. I call it a momentous question; and the words are weighed and measured. It is the first instance when the American Congress has proposed to legislate for alien people living 2,000 miles across the seas, and to confer upon an uneducated people—who do not speak our language, who have never known what civil liberty means, who know absolutely nothing of our traditions, our history, our national purposes or instincts, who never have tasted true liberty—the priceless privilege of American citizenship. At the threshold let Congress pause and look steadily and squarely in the face the thing we are about to do, so that when we have finished our work we may have the applause of the American people and the approbation of our own consciences.

BRIEF ON LAW REGARDING OUR NEW POSSESSIONS.

Cuba is only in our temporary possession, with a pledge that such possession shall not ripen into sovereignty, but be held for the Cuban people, to be surrendered to a government when formed, which shall carry out the obligation we have assumed. Presumably such a government is intended as shall be able to perform the obligation incurred. That is all our interest in Cuba.

But Puerto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago present a different problem. These were conquered, and purchased, and ceded. Our title is full and complete. These islands belong to the United States, but as yet are not a part of the United States.

In the Philippines we have a contest on our hands by some of the former subjects of Spain who rebel against our sovereignty, and until this rebellion is suppressed there can be no thought of civil government and no legislation by Congress in the way of making laws for them is suggested.

But with Puerto Rico the case is entirely different. Here we have had no rebellion, the people are our friends, good order prevails, they demand American laws. They wish to be relieved from the old Spanish laws, royal decrees, and so forth, and from their discriminations and unjust exactions and oppressions. Some few clamor for self-government and representation in Congress, or at least Territorial rights, but these claims are at present at best untenable and need not be considered in this discussion.

But it is universally conceded that in some way our system of laws and jurisprudence should be extended to them, and at once.

The all-important question is how or by whom—by Congress or by the President as Commander in Chief? Undoubtedly both have the power to do so. The effect to follow is, however, quite different.

These islands come to us very differently—that is, on different terms—from any former acquisition of territory. In all other treaties the "political status and civil rights" of the people in the territory ceded as citizens, etc., of the United States was defined in the treaty, which was binding on Congress. Louisiana in 1803 and Florida in 1819 were purchased, New Mexico and California by conquest and by purchase, Alaska by purchase, Texas by annexation, and some other territory by cession from the original States. In all these cases the territory became at once, on approval of the treaty or by its terms, a part of the United States and the people clothed with the rights and duties of citizens.

In this case the treaty provides that "the civil rights and political status of the inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress." This and nothing more, except "the inhabitants of the territories (not citizens) shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion." This last would not have been necessary if these people were at once to be citizens of the United States and our laws were by operation of law, on ratification of the treaty, to be extended over them, as such is the privilege of all under our laws. Again, some provision is made for security of Spanish citizens—natives of Spain—and how they may preserve their allegiance to Spain, and it is provided that in default of this "they shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside," not to have become citizens of the United States, as it was in terms provided in the treaty with Mexico. Again, in Article VII this distinction is made: Each Government relieves the other for all claims of its "citizens or subjects" against the other, etc., and provides, "The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain relinquished in this article." This does not mean the claims of Puerto Ricans, Filipinos, or Cubans, but only of "American citizens."

So that it is clear that by the ratification of this treaty these people did not become American citizens, but remained simply "native inhabitants of the territories ceded," with their political status and civil rights yet to be determined. The treaty does not provide when Congress shall determine this matter. Until it does the islands remain our property, our military possessions, but not a part of the United States, and the people remain "inhabitants of the islands" under our military control. Neither authorities nor precedents are wanting in this country or in Europe for full control and government of these possessions by military authority, though by civil form of government and promulgation of full code of laws and appointment of civil officers by the Commander in Chief, from the time of conquest to government by Congress. As long as Congress does not act the President may, but when Congress does act by declaring the islands a part of the United States, or by assuming to legislate for them as citizens, the military power ceases and Congress must then pass all the legislation for them or authorize them as Territories or States to legislate for themselves.

The laws can not be partly made by Congress and partly by the President as Commander in Chief, as it is only in the absence of Congressional legislation that his power to promulgate laws exists when Congress has the power or when in possession of foreign territory where Congress has not the power. The commander in chief of all nations has possessed this power since governments existed among men; our President therefore had it before the Constitution was adopted, and it does not deny the power. This power to govern extends to all conquered countries and is constitutionally invoked whenever Congress "declares war," and continues till superseded or taken away by surrender or recapture of the territory conquered or by Congress providing for the government.

This power to govern as a military possession applies to a people and to territory not citizens and not a part of the United States as well as to people who are but are without government and disputing our authority, as with the Southern States during and after the rebellion. And the laws so promulgated over foreigners and territory not a part of the United States especially need not in all respects conform to the limitations of the Constitution on the power of Congress to make laws. "The Constitution can have no operation in another country." (In re Ross, 140 U. S., 464.) Also same court, in same case, says:

> By the Constitution a government is ordained and established for the United States of America, and not for countries outside of its limits.

In Fleming vs. Page (9 Howard, 603) it was held that—

> Duties were properly levied and collected on goods imported into the United States from Tampico, Mexico, while that country was in possession of the military forces of the United States. * * * The duties exacted were not those prescribed by law, but by the President of the United States as Commander in Chief.

Florida after it had been ceded was regarded as to customs as a foreign country, etc. The court then says:

> The principle thus adopted by the Executive Department has been sanctioned by this court and the circuit courts whenever the question has come before them. * * * It is sufficient to say that this is no discrepancy between them, and all of them, so far as they apply, maintain that under our revenue laws every port is regarded as a foreign one unless the custom-house from which the vessel clears is within a collection district established by act of Congress and the officers exercise their functions under the authority and control of the laws of the United States.

The same decision holds, page 614, that—

> The conquest or occupation of a foreign country, or a part of it, by our military forces does not enlarge our boundaries nor extend our institutions and laws beyond the original boundaries. That must await the action of Congress.
> The power to make war does not mean for conquest, as such * * * territory conquered may, 'tis true, be held as compensation for expenses, etc., or by treaty of peace, but it is not a part of the United States until accepted as such by the proper authority (Congress). "To all the world [Tampico] was a part of the United States and belonged to them as exclusively as any in our established boundaries, but yet it was not a part of this Union."

Thus far our new possessions have been governed by these rules, duties have been collected, and some laws promulgated, and the course thus followed has ample precedent, both in this country—as in California, New Mexico, Florida, Louisiana, and the Southern States, and has met the approval of the Supreme Court in all cases—and also in Europe by the course pursued by England, Germany, and all other countries. Where the occupied country has no civilized laws of its own, then, as of necessity, the laws of the conquering country go with its flag and its citizens who emigrate to the new land.

No one questions our right, so far, to collect duties and prescribe laws under the military power. The same power can establish civil government and promulgate a full code of civil laws, as was done with New Mexico and maintained for about five years before Congress took any part, and the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the laws and courts thus established. (See Leitzenderfer vs. Webb, 20 Howard, 178.)

> Congress is a creature of the Constitution, and all its powers are derived therefrom and limited by its provisions. (Mormon Church vs. Utah, 136 U. S., pages 1-44.)

In National Bank vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S., 129), in speaking of Territorial government, the court says:

> But Congress is supreme and for the purpose of this department of governmental authority has all the power of the people of the United States except such as have expressly or by implication been reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

And in Scott vs. Sanford (21 Howard, 393) it was held and agreed to by minority that all the prohibitions of the amendments to the Constitution bind Congress in its legislation for the Territories as fully as those in the original instrument, trial by jury, uniform customs duties, presentment by grand jury, etc., as well as the prohibition to pass ex post facto laws. All constitutional prohibitions are denials of power of Congress to legislate.

The same authority also holds, page 449 (and it is acquiesced in by the minority opinions), speaking of a Territory whose population is not ready for State government:

> But some form of civil government is absolutely necessary to organize and preserve civilized society and prepare it to become a State, and, what is best, must depend on the condition of the Territory at the time, and this choice must depend on the discretionary power of Congress, acting within the scope of its constitutional authority and not infringing on the rights of persons or rights of property. * * * It was acquired by the exercise of this authority, and it must be held and governed in like manner until it is fitted for a State.
> But the power of Congress over the person or property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of government. The powers of government and the rights of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. And when the country becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which it alone continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not, when it enters a Territory of the United States, put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers.

In 5 Wheaton, 317, Loughborough vs. Blake, it is held duties and direct taxes shall be alike in States, Territories, and districts of the United States, and holds this to apply to the District of Columbia as part of the United States.

In Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 348) the Supreme Court held that—

> The sovereign power of the United States over Territories is subject to such restrictions as are imposed and expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied by its terms.

Then in the case of the Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., 1 to 44), the court says:

> Doubtless Congress in legislating for the Territories will be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments; but these limitations would exist by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its power, rather than by any express or direct application of its provisions.

And on this ground that court in that case, and in other cases, holds that the constitutional provisions of trial by jury follows, and controls all legislation by Congress for the Territory, and says:

> This is no longer an open question.

And in Colton vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540) the same doctrine is pronounced and applied to the District of Columbia as an integral part of the United States, and carries with it the constitutional provision of trial by jury. By the terms of the Constitution, Congress is given the exclusive power to legislate for the District of Columbia. Yet the Supreme Court held such power was not discretionary, but must comply with the Constitution.

Among the constitutional personal guaranties and limitations on the acts of Congress are not only the provision of trials by jury in civil and criminal cases, but many others, to wit, presentment by grand jury for all felonies; freedom of speech and of the press; the free right of immigration or migration from one part of the country to another; no denial of any privilege to any citizen which is granted to any other citizen; "All duties, imports and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;" "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," and many others which will readily be remembered.

The Constitution recognizes that the United States may have jurisdiction over territory "not a part" of the United States and not Territories or districts, because these latter have been repeatedly held to be included in the term United States, and had been so held prior to the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. As first introduced, that amendment read:

> Slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall not exist in the United States.

Then was added before adoption the words:

> Or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

It is perhaps not possible now to learn why those words were added; yet we had up to that time acquired a considerable new territory, and no one could say we would not continue to do so. Now, all we had acquired up to that time had by treaty provided it should be a part of the Union, but it might not always be so. They perhaps "builded wiser than they knew." We had, however, in 1856 acquired by discovery and taken temporary possession of some guano islands in the Caribbean Sea wholly unclaimed by any nation, and Congress made some provision for allowing the discoverers to remove the guano to the United States, and, to insure order, provided that any crime committed on the island should be held to have been committed on the high seas and in a United States vessel and punished accordingly, and, while so carefully legislating, thought it provident to provide that nothing in the act should be held to make it obligatory on the United States to retain possession of the islands after the guano should be removed, and all this must be preceded by a declaration from the President that such islands "pertained to the United States."

So it was doubtless to cover such cases as where islands or countries should "pertain to the United States," be in temporary possession thereof, and yet not be a "part of the United States," yet while under the jurisdiction of the United States no slavery should exist there. This undoubtedly applies to the Sulu Islands, and slavery, being contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government as well as polygamy, ceased to be lawful immediately on our occupation of these islands, and binds the military as well as civil government. And yet the Constitution did not authorize Congress to pass laws for such a place or country, but left that condition of things to be met by the laws and usages of nations, to be governed, so long as it simply "pertained" to the United States, by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Congress can, under the authority of the treaty, declare these islands a part of the United States, thus making the cession and conquest complete, and the people thereby be declared citizens of the United States and not simply "inhabitants of the islands where they reside," as they are now; but in such case, as we have seen, the laws must conform in all respects to the provisions of the Constitution. Trials by jury in all common-law cases involving $20, and in all criminal cases and in all felonies prosecutions must be by indictment. This, among a people 90 per cent of whom can not read or write and none of whom know anything of such duties, would render administration of justice a farce. "No duties can be collected on goods imported from any State, and all duties and direct taxes must be uniform throughout the United States." This provision of "uniformity of duties," the same rates in all parts of the United States, is the fundamental principle of the Constitution, the one single purpose and thought to accomplish which the Constitutional Convention was called and the principal object of the forming of its instrument; so if any right under the Constitution be conferred on the islands by Congress, this will follow. No restrictions can be placed on the migration of any citizen from the islands, "a part of the United States," to any other part of the United States, and many other requirements of the Constitution.

On the other hand, Congress can by resolution decline to act for the present or for a period of years, or by its silence decline to act, as in case of California and New Mexico, and thus acquiesce in the government by the Commander in Chief. In the first case, if Congress does act and the above view is correct (and it can hardly be expected that the Supreme Court will change its views or holdings), then the action is irremediable, and these people are American citizens, entitled to all the rights and privileges of any other citizens, to Territorial government and eventually to statehood, to protection at home and abroad—Tagalog or Sulu, negro or Spaniard. If Congress declines to act now, then the President will be warranted in proclaiming a full civil government for Puerto Rico at once, and perhaps for Cuba; and if it be found at any time that any part of these possessions are ready for self-government or for Territorial rights, Congress may then or at any time step in and take charge. But if it be found after full trial and all opportunities that any part of the Philippine Islands, for instance, can not be brought to such a condition of civilization as warrants Congressional legislation, and it is found not to be advisable to continue military control indefinitely, an amendment to the Constitution can be made or in some way the problem can be solved without injury to our Government or people and doing no injustice to the people of such islands.

It has been suggested that Congress might make some laws for Puerto Rico now, such as establishing United States courts there, making customs laws, and regulating the currency, and then leave the rest to the President. But it would seem that this can not be. By establishing United States courts, or any other act of distinct municipal legislation, Congress in fact declares the island a part of the United States and its people citizens, otherwise it could not legislate, and if Congress so fixes the "political status," the Commander in Chief loses his power to make laws, and Congress is forbidden to delegate its power to legislate to any person, committee, or body. So whatever reforms are needed would all have to be prescribed by Congressional law. (See 10 Wheaton, §§ 42, 43.)

It has been suggested also by some who have not studied the question that Congress might declare that the islands were not a part of the United States; that the people should remain "inhabitants of the island," etc., and still legislate for them. But this can hardly be possible, as we have seen Congress get its power from the Constitution; that the Constitution establishes a government for America only. Besides, the rule is universal that the laws of Congress or of a State legislature can have no effect beyond the limits of the boundaries of the State or nation. It has been held that the laws of a nation have no extra-territorial effect or jurisdiction. The principle is so plain that no authorities need be cited; but see Halleck's International Law, volume 1, third edition, chapters 6 and 7; Wheaton's International Law, pages 124, 125, third edition, where it is said:

> Every nation possesses and exercises exclusive sovereignty and legislative jurisdiction throughout the full extent of the territory. * * * It is entitled to the exclusive power of legislation in respect to the personal rights and civil state and condition of its citizens, and in respect to all real and personal property situated within its territory, whether belonging to citizens or aliens.
> No State can by its laws directly affect, bind, or regulate property beyond its own territory or control persons who do not reside within it, whether they be native-born subjects or not.
> All the effect which a foreign law can have in a State depends absolutely on the consent of that State.

But here there is no government to give the consent, and in all such exceptions they will be found to affect citizens only and to relate to quality, condition, or the like, as legitimacy, marriage, minority, etc., when by comity these qualifications go with the citizen wherever he goes. The only other exception coming to my notice is in the case of treaties with Japan, China, and some other countries. This comity has been allowed to provide for trial of American citizens committing crimes in these countries by our consuls. But this power rests in the consent of the country expressed in the treaty. We can make no treaty with anybody in Puerto Rico or the Philippine Archipelago.

So it would appear that for Congress to legislate for these islands it must make them our own and complete the conquest by assimilating the country with the balance of the United States and making them a part and parcel of the Union.

As to Puerto Rico, this we may do and doubtless will after a while, but the general opinion among those who are best acquainted is that it will not do now. As to the Philippines, we all know that it will not do now, and yet whatever is done by this Congress for Puerto Rico will be regarded as a precedent for the Philippines when the rebellion is subdued. Congress may not follow such precedent, but the policy of the Administration will be thus marked out, and people generally will expect the same course to be pursued when insurrection is subdued, and those of us who favor expansion will have to meet the question in the selection of the next Congress this year.

But it is asked, "Do not the people of these islands and also the trade of this country need relief in regard to duties which the President can not extend, and especially since treaties with many countries which are competitors, particularly in sugar and tobacco, have been or are about to be given reductions under the reciprocity clause of the tariff law?" The answer must be in the affirmative. The remedy lies in Congress making an amendment to the reciprocity clause by authorizing the President to make, or giving him the power to make, similar reductions, or grade, if thought best, in cases of outlying possessions "pertaining to the United States" in our military possession, where there is no power to make a treaty, as in cases where the treaty may be made with a foreign power having jurisdiction of the country.

As to the reciprocal reductions on the part of the islands, the President already has the power to fix those duties as he pleases and is exercising that authority in all the islands now. There is no doubt in my mind but that the islands need a considerable of the revenue from duties to carry on their governments and make the needed improvements, and it would not be wise to either put all this burden into direct taxes on the people there nor draw it from the Treasury of the United States, and yet one or the other, and probably both, would have to be done if all duties between the islands and the United States should cease at once. And it is equally clear to me that our own industries would suffer loss unless those reductions are made gradually and business interests be allowed to adjust themselves to the new conditions when they do finally come.

Besides, I am abundantly satisfied that a reduction of 25 or 30 per cent on sugar and tobacco would be acceptable to the producers on both sides. If this is not the right amount, then let some other be fixed, but our possessions must fare as well as foreigners, and they ought to have some advantage.

The President can be trusted in all these matters, and a mistake made by him, if one is made, can be promptly remedied either by himself or Congress can take charge at any time it chooses.

Here we have, through the military, as complete a colonial system as is possessed by any other country. Why not use it, at least while we are solving the complicated questions presented? What good reason can be assigned for at once taking the affirmative step and making these people of alien and mixed races American citizens, with no probation, no knowledge of our laws or customs, and 90 per cent absolutely ignorant and uninformed? Why throw down all tariff barriers which we have struggled to erect for the protection of American industries to the lowering of the standard of American citizenship and the injury of all and utter destruction of many American industries?

But the President, if ready to make a change and launch a civil government, with a full code of laws, might well hesitate to do so until he knew the intention of Congress in the matter, as, notwithstanding the President's power, Congress has the final and paramount right to supersede all acts by the President, as Commander in Chief, with laws of its own.

If it be the intention of Congress to legislate for Puerto Rico at this session, it would be unwise for him to make such a change now and install a new government to be so soon displaced.

Of course Congress must act in so grave a matter with deliberation, and only after much investigation, and it can hardly be expected to reach this matter in one session; but still it may do so. But if any legislation be undertaken, let a full code of laws be provided by the experienced hands of Congress and leave nothing to experimenting.

The better plan, therefore, would seem to be for Congress to declare by resolution early in the session whether or not it will enter on this work at this session. And if it decides not to do so, the President would then be warranted in acting, having this assurance, that his laws would be allowed to remain in force for some definite time. At least they would be given a more permanent character than if liable to be displaced at any time, and would thus be more efficient in securing the needed reforms so imperatively demanded now.

Then while these laws are in operation the people of the islands will be given the benefit of good American laws and be preparing themselves for Congressional government when it comes to them, and to take a larger share in the management of their own affairs than would be wise and prudent at this time.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has drifted into a consideration of the policy of the Administration touching the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico. I do not want to discuss that question now, Mr. Chairman, because in my humble judgment it ought not to be discussed. When the earth is drinking the warm blood of American heroes—such distinguished soldiers as General Lawton—it seems to me that that which is most seemly, that which is fit to be done, is to stand by the flag of our country and by the Commander in Chief of the American Army—our President. [Applause.]

When resistance to American authority shall have ceased, and when our heroes shall have completed the task now committed to their charge, and which they are completing in a manner of which I know every American citizen is proud, then the time will come for us to discuss the proposition as to what we shall do with the Philippines and the Filipinos. At present it is our duty to strengthen in every way that we can the arms that hold the swords and the strong hearts of the men who are our bayonet bearers in a foreign territory—territory belonging now to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have been impressed with one idea touching this matter. It seems to me that the only objection that can be urged by distinguished gentlemen on the other side of this House to our President, the Commander in Chief, is that he accomplished more than they desired him to do—that he accomplished, as head of the armies, more than was expected. Why, sir, the destruction of the Spanish fleet was of itself enough to shed glory upon the Commander in Chief of the armies of these United States. The result of that victory in all probability, or at any rate in the opinion of the Senate of the United States, which was the only tribunal that could determine the matter—the result of that victory was the submission of a certain treaty to the Senate. Before that treaty was passed upon by the Senate and ratified there was time for discussion. But since the treaty has been ratified, what is the duty of every citizen?

It seems to me the duty of every citizen, and especially of every member of this House, is to say everything in his power in laudation of the course of the Administration instead of criticism. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, if my brethren on the other side will allow me to indulge in a little pleasantry, what is the position that you occupy? It seems to me, without intending any discourtesy, that, being in the minority, you occupy now the position of the hind wheel on a wagon. Your methods are simply to throw mud upon the fore wheels, which you follow. What good can you accomplish by that kind of argument? [Laughter.] Why not join us? Why not join the Republicans touching this matter? You had as much to do in bringing on this war as the Republicans had. You cussed us out on that side of the House because we did not jump into the war sooner.

Mr. GAINES. We made you declare war.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes; you made us declare war, and now you are cussing us because we did better than you thought we could. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES. And we are trying to make you do right now.

Mr. LINNEY. In other words, Mr. Chairman, a Democrat is always a very brave man in civil matters [laughter]; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I have arisen to discuss something else that, in my opinion, is of as great importance as the Philippines. General Otis will take care of the rebels in the Philippine Islands. It is now the duty of the patriots of this country, on the Democratic side as well as our side, to take care of our people here.

I want to read another matter to which the President of the United States called attention, and to which I propose to address my remarks. I read from the President's last message:

> The constituted authorities must be cheerfully and vigorously upheld. Lynching must not be tolerated in a great and civilized country like the United States. Courts, not mobs, must execute the penalties of the law. The preservation of public order, the right of discussion, the integrity of courts, and the orderly administration of justice must continue forever the rock of safety upon which our Government securely rests.

I would emphasize the right of public discussion, Mr. Chairman, as having come from the mind of the President twice before this body, as being an absolutely essential force to the preservation and protection of this grand republican form of government of ours.

Let us see whether I am right about this. Some one said to me not long ago, "LINNEY, why is it that you want always to talk about elections?" My reply to him was this: That one of the best old preachers that ever I knew, who was a Hard-shell Baptist, was in the habit of preaching from this text, "Ye must be born again." After he had preached from that text a dozen times or more, some gentleman went to him and said, "My brother, why is it you have only got that one text?" "Because," replied the grand old man, "ye must be born again." [Laughter.] So say I touching fair elections. We must have fair elections and less lynching.

Mr. COX. You had better be born again!

Mr. LINNEY. My friend often presents strong evidence on this floor that he has been born again. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this matter is a serious one. The heart of the Republic is this day sad because of things that have recently happened in Kentucky. There is not a man within the sound of my voice, not a member upon this floor, nor a spectator in the gallery, who has not been made sad by occurrences which, in my opinion, have reference to the matters about which I propose to talk.

At the Chicago convention, four hundred years from the time that Columbus discovered America, the people of the United States selected three probably of the ablest men they possessed—the Vice-President, a great Kentucky orator, and Mr. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, of New York—to turn the lantern of freedom upon this system of government before the eyes of the representatives of the assembled universe at Chicago. Their purpose was to make a display of our system, as well as a display of the material developments of this country. These three speeches, in every sentence of them, are laudatory of our system of government, presenting it to the foreign representatives of the different nations without anything at all to mar its beauty, until they come to touch this question of elections. That was the only infirmity in the system.

That was the only thing to which the attention of foreign nations was called, upon which a criticism could possibly be grounded, touching this republican form of government, which is the world's best hope. I read from this memorial of the World's Columbian Exposition touching that matter. The eloquent orator from Kentucky—grand old Kentucky, home of Henry Clay and of the grand men who now sit upon this floor, whose intelligence and whose patriotism command the attention of every beholder—uttered these words:

> A better opportunity could not be desired for a study of our peculiarities than is furnished for the present moment. We are in the midst of the quadrennial period established for the selection of a chief magistrate. Every citizen has his right of choice. Each has his right to vote, and to have the votes properly cast and properly counted. Wherever this right has failed for any cause, wrong is done and evil must follow, first to the whole country, which has an interest in all its parts, but most to the community immediately involved, which must actually drink of the cup that has contained the poison, and can not escape its infection.
> The abridgment of the right of suffrage is very nearly proportioned to the ignorance or the indifference to the parties directly concerned in it, and there is good reason to hope that, with expanding intelligence of the masses and the growing enlightenment of the times, this particular form of corruption in elections will be reduced below the danger line.

On this great occasion, this great reasoner, being then, as he now is, a member of that party organization to which I do not belong, was able to point out, not only to the representatives of the assembled nations but to the reflecting people of these United States, that here was only one infirmity in the system, and that that infirmity, that error, that crime, I may denominate it, had at that time gotten above the danger line, and, in substance, that it did require a quickening of the American conscience to press the evil below the danger line.

What else said he, Mr. Chairman?

> There is no geography in American manhood. There are no sections of American fraternity. It needs but six days and a change of raiment to convert the Vermonter into a Texan, and there never has been a time when the battlefield or on the frontier "Puritan" and "Cavalier" were not convertible terms, having in the beginning a common origin, and so diffused and diluted on American soil as no longer to possess a local habitation or a nationality except in this national unit.
> The curse of slavery is gone. It was a joint heritage of woe, to be wiped out and expiated in blood and flame. The mirage of the Confederacy has vanished. It was essentially bucolic, a form of the most attractive economic fallacy.
> The Constitution is no longer a rope of sand. The exact relation of the States to the Federal Government, left open to double construction by the fathers of our organic being because they could not agree among themselves and union was their paramount object, has been clearly and definitely fixed by the last three amendments to the original chart, which constitutes the real treaty of peace between the North and the South and seals our bonds of nationality forever.

That was the view taken of these last amendments, which were intended to reduce this infirmity of which the orator spoke below the danger line. That was the view presented for the consideration of the representatives of the various nations of the world.

Now, in view of that, Mr. Chairman, let us look for a moment. There have been about 100 lynchings a year, to say nothing of the assassinations, in this country of law and order, of Bibles, of churches, of eloquent pulpit orators, in this fair land of ours.

Yes, the blood of 100 citizens every year has been shed contrary to law, shed by human hands, without warrant, every year since 1891, and in the year 1898, if I get the figures correctly, there were 127 lynchings. Seven-twelfths of these lynchings took place in the States that do not give more than one-fourth of their votes. Now, why was that? Let me see if I can not show why. I will read a few definitions of a republic and of the ballot:

John Milton said that a commonwealth ought to be but one huge Christian personage, one mighty growth, the stature of a man, as big in virtue as the body; or you may let it sink into an ignoble form, with the name of a republic, but without its soul.

The ballot is a great guaranty. It is the peacemaker, the reconciler, the schoolmaster, and the protector. I believe that is the view of Charles Sumner. Aristotle has given the best definition of a republic to my mind. He teaches that it is best in every republican government to admit to a participation in the governing power as many as can be admitted with safety, for where large numbers are excluded there will be discontent and danger.

All these great authors of the past teach this: "Liberty can have no certain dwelling in any state except where the laws are equal and the power of public opinion is supreme." It was left for the lamented Blaine to state, in language which will ring throughout the country forever, that a departure from these elementary principles of liberty will lead to the other extreme, "where murder is an occupation and perjury a pastime," etc.

Mr. Chairman, I want to talk calmly and dispassionately in this matter. I live in the South. I live in a section of country where I know if I say anything in heat or with animation it will be severely criticised. I know it will bring upon my head hostile judgments, and therefore I talk with some embarrassment. But I have this idea: It is not the suppression of an infirmity in any system in any section, it is not the ferreting out the evil and suppressing it that hurts the Government.

That man or that set of men or that organization that does that, in my own opinion, becomes the greatest public benefactor. It is the existence of those wrongs in the community that diseases it and produces assassination and lynching, and not exposure thereof. Now, let us see if it can be proven. I think I can establish the fact that in exact proportion as the people are deprived of their votes, in that exact proportion you have lynchings and assassinations.

What is the ballot? The late lamented Mr. Justice Hunt, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of United States vs. Reese et al. (92, U. S. Report), has defined the ballot with technical precision. No definition of any tenure by which man has ever exercised dominion is more perfect: "That greatest of rights among freemen is the ballot. Just as far as the ballot to the citizen is abridged, in the same degree the citizen's importance and security is diminished."

Here we have the definition of the tenure by which men hold their liberties as clearly stated as a proverb, or as any great sage of the law has ever defined any tenure from a tenant at sufferance to an estate in fee simple, or of a contingent remainder on the rule of Shelly's case. The idea of the individual importance and security of his personal and property rights is the inspiration of this definition. All human effort has for its object the importance and security of the individual putting forth the effort.

Without the recording of the ballot, individual possibility and importance would cease to animate American citizenship and American manhood life in a large degree. Hence springs the strong desire of the citizen to vote.

Indeed, our Republic would not last half as long with a well-settled conviction that the ballot box everywhere no longer voiced the popular will as it would under the blaze and thunders of all the artillery of any combination of foreign foes turned against us. In fact, the pent-up fury of the popular heart, even expressed sometimes in this high place of reason and law, at the supposition of wrong and oppression on the part of Government would explode and shake our entire system as a volcano does the mountain covered by its own lava but for this escape valve, the ballot box.

It has been said that one hundred years of uninterrupted peace would enslave mankind. It is highly probable that a failure to open the polls, or if opened, only for fraud or force to neutralize the legal force of the ballot, for even ten years would be as disastrous to the Republic as the touch of leprosy would be to the most vital spark of human life. This condition of the popular mind accounts for the large vote that is recorded upon the poll lists at every general election where there is a contest.

The exercise of the elective franchise is as charming and potential in claiming and commanding the attention and action of our people as any natural law commands and controls the habits of the lower order of animate creation. It is, when one gets at the bottom of it, founded in or springs out of the law of self-preservation.

We take food to preserve life. We vote to uphold and perpetuate that which is dearer than life to the intelligent American citizen—liberty. From Boston to Austin, from Massachusetts to Texas, wherever the elector can vote, the rule is he votes. Even in Massachusetts, where manhood suffrage is restricted by an educational qualification, about 22,000 electors from each Congressional district find their way to the ballot box. In the great State of Texas, where manhood suffrage is relied upon to support social order and the political life of that immense Commonwealth, over 30,000 freemen at every general election where there is a contest march to the poles with ballots in their hands, as proud and grand as the President of these United States in the performance of the highest functions of the greatest office in the world resting upon the foundations of popular suffrage.

Happy condition here where there is not even a registrar between the citizen elector and the ballot box except in the cities. In North Carolina about 35,000 in every Congressional district, under the laws of 1895, found their way to the ballot box, although they sometimes did it at the risk of being singed and scalded by the heat of partisan rancor on election day or disturbance in some sections after election day by the gentle Christian demands of "committees of law and order." In Colorado in two Congressional districts 142,024 votes are the glittering, precious, delicate, opalescent tints in the political life of the two distinguished gentlemen from Colorado, Messrs. SHAFROTH and BELL. Woman suffrage is valued more highly there than all the gems and silks that ever adorned a fair maiden's form. [Laughter.]

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the same law of nature upon which Judge Hunt founded the ballot, a laudable purpose to enlarge individual importance and strengthen the vigilance of the sentinels that guard individual security, asserted its omnipotent demands upon the female heart and mind of Colorado. Modesty to them still possessed all its charms as a polishing and a refining factor in female character. Even if modesty's eternal camping ground had been in that paradisaical spot of earth where only the viands of nectar and trees of ambrosial fruitage flourish, woman as an elector yielding to the law of nature in which the ballot is founded, would for a time put on her business costume and cast her vote, despite the heat of many strifes and political rancor at the polls. [Laughter.]

Why do we witness these results, Mr. Chairman? It is the fruitage of the law of self-preservation. Sir, nature proclaims with no less certainty that the "merry eyes of youth often overrun with laughter" than that man, proud man, when free, will vote to enlarge his importance and strengthen his personal security.

The spirit of Pierpont's poetry must always abide with the American patriot:

A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God;
And from its force nor doors nor locks
Can shield you,—'tis the ballot box.

Wherever there is not a reasonably large vote at an election it is generally attributable to the operation of some illegal method that prevents. Mr. Best, in his excellent little work on Presumptions, teaches that presumptions founded in nature are of the most reliable character. No human testimony can shake their force. He gives this illustration: Wherever the webfoot is found in the fowl creation there is a disposition and capacity to swim. God gave the waterfowl this natural paddle with which to even navigate turbulent waters.

Should the direct testimony of any number of witnesses contradict this natural law, it must fail. It is only the diseased fowl that does not use nature's paddle to increase its importance. Death is near when the webfooted fowl marches away from the waters to surrender forever this great natural power. So also the free American citizen retires from the ballot box only because of a diseased political condition which prevents his voting.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me see about these matters—whether I am right or not. I address your reason; I address the reason of the people of the South and North, too, people of the entire Republic. Let me take the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Georgia, and South Carolina, and they have, I believe, 58 electoral votes, and they cast 100,000 votes less than the States of Texas and North Carolina, that have only 26 electoral votes. Texas and North Carolina give almost 100,000 votes more than these six. But when you come to distribute the honors of lynching, these States get 70 and we only get 7, and I do not think that is fair. [Laughter.] I would like to understand the mystery.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has distributed the lynchings in other States than in the South—say Illinois or Ohio?

Mr. LINNEY. Why, in Ohio, and all those States north of Mason and Dixon's line, the lynchings are no more than the insignificant flash of a lightning bug to the great stream of electricity from the heavens in comparison with sections where voting is suppressed. [Laughter.] I take from the World Almanac the following:

LYNCHINGS, LEGAL EXECUTIONS, AND EMBEZZLEMENTS.

Lynchings.—1891, 192; 1892, 235; 1893, 200; 1894, 100; 1895, 171; 1896, 131; 1897, 166; 1898, 127. Total, 1,412.

The lynchings in 1898 were distributed as follows: Arkansas, 17; South Carolina, 14; Georgia, 12; Missouri, 6; Kentucky, 6; Louisiana, 6; Texas, 3; Maryland, 2; Oklahoma, 1; Washington, 1; Wyoming, 3; Illinois, 1; Indiana, 1; Mississippi, 15; Indian Territory, 3; New Mexico, 1; Alabama, 12; North Carolina, 4; Tennessee, 6; Virginia, 4; West Virginia, 1; Florida, 1; Alaska, 1; Kansas, 1; Montana, 1. Of the total number, 103 were negroes, 23 whites, and 2 Indians. Up to September 11 there were 93 persons lynched in the United States in 1899.

Legal executions.—The number of legal executions in 1898 was 109, as compared with 128 in 1897, 122 in 1896, 132 in 1895, 132 in 1894, 126 in 1893, and 107 in 1892. The legal executions in 1898 were distributed as follows: Louisiana, 10; Arkansas, 6; Alabama, 3; Mississippi, 6; Tennessee, 2; Missouri, 5; Florida, 1; Maryland, 1; Massachusetts, 3; Oregon, 2; Minnesota, 2; Connecticut, 1; Ohio, 2; Georgia, 8; Virginia, 8; South Carolina, 4; Texas, 10; North Carolina, 2; Indian Territory, 2; Kentucky, 3; California, 10; New York, 3; Illinois, 6; Washington, 1; Pennsylvania, 7; New Jersey, 1. There were 72 hanged in the South and 37 in the North, of whom 60 were whites, 48 blacks, and 1 Chinese. The crimes for which they were executed were murder 100, and assault 9.

Yes, North Carolina has cast 95 per cent of her qualified vote; but if she is forced to submit to the present proposed Democratic methods, she will probably not cast 30 per cent thereof. The result is that we have only had four lynchings in North Carolina in 1898 and only one in 1897, when the Democrats were out of power, and there were only three in Texas—a singular contrast to other States. For instance, in the whole State of South Carolina the vote for Congressmen was only 28,912 votes, while the district that I represent cast 37,000 votes.

In one district of one State there were cast for one member more votes than were cast for seven members in another State. When we come to distribute what we may call one of the luxuries of the world—lynching—North Carolina receives but four, while in the States that do not give a reasonably full vote 15 lynchings occur usually. What does it mean? I have no ill-feeling toward any State of the Union. It simply means a diseased condition of the country, such as, if continued, must produce anarchy and death.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, sir; I yield for a question.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. My question is this: The gentleman has stated the number of lynchings in the various States, and in doing so he complimented my own State, which is neither here nor there. Now, I want to ask him this question; and in answering it I hope he will be fair to the House and will be fair toward the people that he denounces. I ask him to state what proportion of these lynchings is due to a certain cause——

A MEMBER. Rape.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I ask him to state what proportion is due to assaults by colored men upon white females.

Mr. LINNEY. There you have it, Mr. Chairman; you can not discuss any question with a Southern Democrat, no matter what it is, that he does not holler "Nigger." According to statistics, the lynchings were of whites, Indians, and negroes—more negroes than otherwise, it is true.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me one more suggestion?

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I do not defend lynching. I am as much opposed to it as any man in the United States, and my people are opposed to it.

Mr. LINNEY. I believe that.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. But in justice to this House should not the gentleman state the fact that in almost every instance the lynching occurs in consequence of the assaults of colored men upon the virtue of white women? And if such things occurred in the North the same justice would be meted out to the offenders.

Mr. WHITE. Since my race is assailed, please allow me to answer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] yield? He has the floor.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE. I have examined that question and I am prepared to state that not more than 15 per cent of the lynchings are traceable to that crime, and there are many more outrages against colored women by white men than there are by colored men against white women.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, the point I make is this: The suggestion of my friend from Texas is a good one, and I thank him for it. He has not these lynchings in his State, thank God, and we have them not in ours. Why? Because in his State they have a pure ballot, as we did have in ours up to the vicious election laws of 1899.

Now, I will ask the gentleman from Texas a question. Does he believe that the State of Texas could have any such thing as order and regard for law and its administration, with no victims to anger and hatred, if two-thirds of the people are denied the right to vote there? I ask you, Do you believe that? Now, gird up your loins and answer me like a man. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I will answer the gentleman freely; and my loins need not be girded up. Neither have I been born again, as the gentleman has, in the Republican party. So far as my State is concerned, no man on this floor or elsewhere challenges the purity and justice of our elections. So far as concerns the condition in my sister States of the South I personally know nothing about it. I may have my own ideas. And I will say in all frankness to the gentleman from North Carolina that my views are not similar to his. I believe entirely in the truth of the suggestion I made just now—that five-sixths of the lynchings which occur in the Southern States of this Union are from the cause I have stated; the same crime in the State of Michigan or Iowa or Massachusetts would produce the same deplorable results.

Several MEMBERS rose, desiring to interrupt.

Mr. LINNEY. I do not yield now; directly I will do so.

I wish to say that the distinguished gentleman from Texas has not answered my question. He does not say whether if the same course of procedure were followed in his State that has been adopted in some other States—a procedure which would reduce the popular vote from two-thirds to one-fourth—whether he would not expect these very same results (of increased lynchings and assassinations). I do not believe he will answer to the contrary. I do not believe any intelligent man would do so.

Why are there so few lynchings in Texas, and why were there scarcely any in North Carolina in 1897 and 1898, though there are thousands of negroes there, as in Texas? It is because the voice of the people finds expression through the ballot box. Wherever there is an obstruction of the popular voice, wherever there is a failure of the expression of the popular will through the ballot box, the result is disclosed in rowdyism and assassination and lynching.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I am glad to hear the gentleman defend the elections in his State of North Carolina.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes; as long as North Carolina can have honest elections there will probably not be many lynchings or assassinations.

Now, I want to show that this negro question has nothing in the world to do with it in any States except, possibly, Mississippi and Alabama. Let me see if I can not prove it. Why, the Democrats are just as keen to get the negro vote as we are. I read from the Charlotte Observer of November 22, 1899:

From the time the negro became a voter until very recently it was customary to hear Democratic stump speakers urge him, in the most persuasive tone and language, to cast in his political fortunes with his real friends. The speakers' words were received either sullenly or with derisive laughter, and straightway the negro went and voted the Republican ticket again.

It can not be said, with a fair regard for the facts, that the Southern Democrats have left untried any means to win the political favor of the negro. Every effort has failed miserably. The negro has voted uniformly for bad government, and the conditions which he has brought about have become intolerable. There is nothing left the white man but to disfranchise him or move out. We say this in sorrow, not in anger.

Now, suppose the negro had voted the Democratic ticket. Would you have heard anything in opposition to him? No; there would have been laudation after laudation heaped upon him. Why, let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, I was once a member of the Democratic party. I was a Randall Democrat; and when Randallism went out, instead of doing as the gentleman from Texas did, I went out, too, and I thank God for it. I think I feel better because I did. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

And I have but little respect for the opinion of any gentleman, while I have great respect for the man himself, who denounces another man for having changed his opinion. What do you go to preaching for? What do you have discussions for? What do you have these things for, if it is not to get wisdom and understanding, and to make your action conform to it? I only know of two things in this world that never change their opinion. One of them is a dead horse and the other is a live ass. [Laughter.]

The argument I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, is that the negro question in all the States does not affect it. It is the mad, wild rush for office that does it, and I want to call the attention of my friends to the fact that it will ultimately destroy the communities in which it exists.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a letter appearing in a Democratic paper in the State of Mississippi, in which it is said that the last discussion which occurred there came very near producing bloodshed, although it was a discussion taken part in by two of the ablest men and two of the most conservative men upon the floor of this House. Why was it? It was because of the fact that there is a good deal of party rancor and hate and passion founded in the well-grounded belief that people do not get a fair chance either at the ballot box or in the discussion of public sentiment. There is practically but one party there. If it is not this, to what can it be traced?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman state what two gentlemen participated in that debate?

Mr. LINNEY. I will read from the letter to which I refer. It is in the Yazoo City Herald, of March 24, 1899, a Democratic paper:

It is to be deplored that the aspirants for Senatorial honors at Winona should have so far departed from that high and dignified standard of public debate that should characterize those desiring to represent a great Christian Commonwealth in the highest office in the gift of her people.

They should remember that such debates will arouse in the State the most revengeful feelings of the human heart as the people range themselves upon one side or the other; that a continuation of such a campaign will produce strife, bitterness, and perhaps bloodshed. It will arouse a perfect whirlwind of passion until the State will become torn and divided into factions and the minds of our people diverted from the great questions of moral, industrial, and educational reform, which should engage the thoughts, stir the heart, and animate the minds and move the energies of our people in the great march of progress in our State and onward movement to a career of glory and renown.

There was no Republican there to create excitement and feeling, because there is no Republican organization there. What else? Right there in this very same paper, it turns out that—not connected with the election, I admit——

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman what paper he is reading from?

Mr. LINNEY. This refers to the Winona meeting, and I have read from the Yazoo City Herald. What else? In this same paper I read of an occurrence which took place in that community, showing that in a country where there is no opportunity of discussion—and I do not say you by force prevent discussion, but I do say that by reason of conditions existing there, there is no such thing as the arraignment of public abuses at the bar of public reason, and the result is there is more pent-up thunder in those communities where they do not get the right to vote than anywhere else in the world. Now, in the same issue of this paper, I read the following. See what took place:

LYNCHED—THE THREE NEGROES, BOYD, REED, AND WILSON, SHOT.

Last week's Herald contained an account of trouble between the whites and blacks at midnight, on Dr. Powers's Refuge plantation, Sunday, March 12. Three of the negroes, C. M. Reed, Minor Wilson, and Willis Boyd, charged with being implicated in shooting at the whites, were arrested and brought to Yazoo City and placed in jail, where they were held until the authorities of Sharkey County could come for them.

On Friday last Constable Sylvester, of Sharkey County, called for the prisoners, and they were delivered to him by Sheriff Johnston. They were taken aboard the steamer Rescue and carried to Belzoni, in Washington County. Meager news was received in Yazoo City Monday that soon after the boat reached Belzoni the negroes were taken from the officer by a mob and shot to death, their bodies being weighted down and thrown into the river.

From some of the officers who brought Reed, Boyd, and Wilson to Yazoo City the Herald learns the evidence against them was very slight. This but makes the lynching of them the more horrible and inexcusable. Brown and Davis, who caused the trouble, are still at large.

The men were only suspected of having shot at somebody.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Was that in reference to the Winona meeting that you were reading?

Mr. LINNEY. I do not know what that was in regard to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You ought not to say, if you do not know.

Mr. LINNEY. I read it from a Democratic paper, and I did not suppose you would object to it, coming from that source.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There was a time when you would not.

Mr. LINNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another thing.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman kindly said he would yield to me.

Mr. LINNEY. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has done my State a great injustice.

Mr. LINNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia with pleasure.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has made some reference to elections in Georgia.

Mr. LINNEY. I did not mention Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and I want the gentleman to point in the history of Georgia, in the last thirty years, or since 1872, where there has been an election riot, where there has been any proof capable of being established, or any well-founded claim, that there were fraudulent elections in Georgia. Yea, more, I call upon the gentleman now to state whether or not the facts that I have called his attention to are not true. He and I have been on contested-election cases——

Mr. LINNEY. My friend, you are making a speech instead of asking a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. We have been on contested-election cases ever since the Fifty-fourth Congress. We had two contested-election cases from Georgia, and that committee unanimously joined in a report that sustained the sitting member.

Mr. LINNEY. So mote it be, my friend.

Mr. BARTLETT. Hear me a minute more.

Mr. LINNEY. You are making a speech, and I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask the gentleman to state if what I have said is not true?

Mr. LINNEY. I said nothing about Georgia except in recounting the lynchings that took place I stated what Georgia's pro rata was. I do not know why the vote of Georgia was not larger. I do not know what it was; but I do say that wherever a vote is suppressed you find the fruits of it springing up in mobocracy and lynchings, and I further say that where all legal electors are permitted to participate in the elections, as they are in Texas, and where a full vote is cast, then we have no more lynchings. But I must hurry on.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LINNEY. I find the voting population of South Carolina in 1860 was 60,000, who were 21 years of age. What sort of right to vote is there enjoyed in a State which sent over 70,000 white men to the war and not one-half that number now vote. And I say that the result is discontent and danger; and I tell my friends from South Carolina that they will see in less than five years from this time dreadful results.

Mr. TALBERT. South Carolina will be able to take care of herself without your assistance. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to allude to these facts for another purpose. They have an election law in South Carolina, and North Carolina is about to pass a like law. If South Carolina is right I want to know it, and if South Carolina is wrong I want to find that out.

Mr. TALBERT. South Carolina is always right.

Mr. LINNEY. And whether it will be harmful to my people. Now, let us see what the people of North Carolina propose to do. They have proposed now in North Carolina to do what? I think they have proposed in North Carolina to do that which is worse than any law they have enacted in South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. Now you are talking.

Mr. LINNEY. Much worse than South Carolina. I am always ready to do justice to South Carolina. In South Carolina they have a law there, a registration law, and their constitution, which I have examined, provides that any registered voter deprived of a vote shall have the right of appeal.

Mr. TALBERT. That is right.

Mr. LINNEY. And that is a wise provision and is provided by their constitution. There are several things that I can see in the law that I do not like. When I see the word "discreet," I will state to you that, whenever you find that word "discreet" in a statute you may look out for some devilment. Why not say, "Each party to select an election officer?" I have examined the law books, and I know what "good and lawful" means.

"Discreet" is defined in St. Mark, and it means a man near the Kingdom, and whenever I see it in an election law, instead of saying one election officer for each party of good and lawful men, you may look out for something wrong. By the word "discreet" they put in men who are not of different political parties, or if they do, one party selects them, and by the use of that pious word "discreet" a great deal of this wickedness is done. I will say that South Carolina does contain the wise provision of allowing an appeal from the registration.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will state to the gentleman that Georgia does also.

Mr. LINNEY. Georgia is getting nearer the Kingdom, too. [Laughter.] Now, here is the statute, section 11, of North Carolina, and I want gentlemen to listen to it. And I ask any man on the floor of the House whether it is probable that a man over 50 years of age would register there at all, except merely at the discretion of the registrar?

SEC. 11. That before the next general election, on the first Thursday in August in the year of our Lord 1900, provided for in this act, there shall be an entirely new registration of all persons who shall be entitled to register in every voting precinct in the State, and only such persons as are registered shall be entitled to vote in any election held under this act; that in all cases the applicant for registration shall be sworn by the registrar before being registered, and shall state and answer his age, place of residence, stating ward, if he resides in an incorporated town or city; number of his house, if numbered, and if not numbered, then a designation of its locality by streets; and if not the owner, then the name of the owner or renter.

If not a resident of an incorporated town or city, he shall then state his place of residence in the election precinct; and if he is not the owner of the house in which he lives, then he shall state the name of the person who does own the same or upon whose land he lives; the time of his residence in said county, ward, or election precinct, his avocation, place of business, where and by whom employed, if employed; if a newcomer, from whence he comes and his post-office address before removal; whether he has been disqualified as a voter by judgment or decree of any court, if so, by what court reinstated; whether he has listed for taxation his poll for the current year in which he proposes to register, and for the year next preceding, if liable to pay a poll tax, and any other questions which may be regarded by the registrar as material upon the question of the identity and qualification of the said applicant to be admitted to registration. The registrar may require the applicant to prove his identity or age and residence by the testimony of at least two electors under oath.

And then, after the poor, trembling applicant has passed this civil-service examination, unless the registrar adjudges that he is an elector he can not register.

This new law in North Carolina does not provide for an appeal from the action of the registrar, and is in that respect more unjust to the citizen than the South Carolina law, under the operations of which not more than one-third of the white people of the State vote, as is shown by the Congressional Directory, which we all have. The practical workings of these laws ignore race distinction altogether. They operate to the prejudice of the white man, even where their necessity is claimed to exclude the negro.

The new election law in North Carolina, coupled with the proposed amendments to the constitution, puts it in the power of the Democratic party to bind with withes stronger than Samson's any elector without regard to his race. The allegation, therefore, that those who oppose these amendments are in favor of negro supremacy is absolutely false. In fact, should the Democrats exercise the power which the new election law confers upon the registrar, it will disfranchise more white men than negroes. The registrar may require every applicant for registration to prove his age by two electors.

A white man 50 years of age would find it exceedingly difficult to make this proof when the mother is not allowed to be a witness, as would also the old plantation slave, while the young negro of 25 years of age and under could easily procure such testimony. And here the temptation on the registrar to sin is too strong for weak humanity to resist. Men's minds are inflamed in all excited political contests. Should a white man 60 years of age not agree with a partisan registrar, he could be disfranchised by such registrar, even though his gray hairs are stronger evidence that he is 21 years of age than all the human testimony in the world.

Gray hairs and wrinkles, the evidence of age which nature's unerring hand has placed upon the old head, are not electors, and therefore this old, trembling applicant, should he be a Populist or a Republican, will stand before such a registrar as a sheep before his shearer, while the young negro will be able to meet the demands of this registrar by two electors who were present at his birth. There are thousands of white men in North Carolina who were not born in the State, or who, though born in the State, are 40 years of age and upward, would be unable to comply with this demand of the registrar. Let each white man in the State over 40 years apply this law to his own case and he will see how unjust it becomes.

I will make the application to myself. I am the oldest Linney now living, and am only 58 years of age; there is no member of my family or kin by whom the required proof could be made. When men of my age make an application to register, an ignorant, bitter partisan registrar could draw his head under his shell, as does the highland terrapin, and refuse, in the language of the statute, to adjudge, and we would thereby be disfranchised. The white freeman who would not fight as with beak and claw any such iniquitous legislation has certainly "eaten the insane root that takes the reason prisoner."

Under the exciting and false cry of "negro domination" white men who do not surrender their manhood convictions to the care and keeping of others are to be disgraced and degraded, because it is the ballot to which man must look for his importance and protection. Moreover, this new election law, if followed by the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendments, attempts to stop the march of the elector through the gateway to the ballot box by the use of both bribery and threats. The entries of the registrar upon the registration books are made evidence in a criminal prosecution against the applicant, in violation of the plain rules of evidence recognized by every law writer on the subject. Even where a man is convicted before a jury in a superior court, the verdict and sentence of the court are not legal evidence against him in any civil action to which he may be a party, except where he entered the plea of guilty.

It also attempts to debauch the poor man who has not paid his taxes by offering him a bribe to the amount of his poll tax if he does not vote. The Kentucky and South Carolina laws, severe and just as the criticisms of these laws are, after a careful examination of them I state, without the fear of successful contradiction, do not make registration as difficult as the new election law in North Carolina. I do not believe that there is a well-informed lawyer in the State who has not read the case of Van Bokkelen et al. vs. Canaday and others, 73 North Carolina Report, and does not therefore know that this new election law is unconstitutional and void. Judge Reade, of our supreme court, in that case says:

> The constitution ordains that the general assembly shall provide for the registration of voters, and that no one shall vote without registration. (Article 6, section 2.)
>
> This means that the general assembly shall provide the conveniences and necessaries, so that the voter can register. It is to facilitate the exercise of the right of suffrage, and not to defeat it. It is true that this includes the power and the duty to throw such guards around as will protect the ballot from fraud. And therefore our general election law provides that when a voter offers to register or vote he may be challenged and required to take an oath as to his qualifications. And so in our general law regulating town elections. (Battle's Revisal.)
>
> There can be no objection to that, and it prevents no man from voting and puts him to no inconvenience. If a man will swear that he has the qualifications, then he can register and vote, unless it can be proved against him that he is not entitled. And in that case he can be rejected. But the act under consideration is framed upon the idea of making the ballot as difficult as possible. Indeed, it makes it impracticable. It provides that "any elector may and it shall be the duty of the registrar to challenge the right of any person to register known or suspected not to be lawfully entitled to register; and when such challenge shall be made it shall be the duty of the register to require such person to prove to the satisfaction of the registrar the fact of his being a lawful age to vote, the fact of his residence for twelve months in the State and for ninety days in the lot," etc.
> It will be noted that any bystander may challenge the voter without proving anything against him, and the voter is not allowed to swear to his qualifications; but he must prove them by the oaths of others, and these others must be known to the registrar and the registrar must be satisfied. Now, how is it possible for persons who move into Wilmington from other counties in the State to get witnesses from a distance known to registrars in Wilmington to prove their ages and their residences? It is impossible. It is a practical denial of the right to register and vote.

In that case it was held that the act was unconstitutional and that the parties elected under such an act were not entitled to the office to which they claimed to be elected; because they were elected under an unconstitutional law. Well, the question has been asked, Why do not you Republicans appeal to a Republican court in North Carolina? It is enough to answer that the act does not provide for appeals, as does even the constitution of South Carolina. Now, to show the true character of the wild, mad rush in North Carolina for office by the Democratic party in North Carolina, I will read a short extract from a statement of ex-Judge Avery which appeared in the Charlotte Observer recently:

> No supreme court judge has the power to grant an injunction. If the committee shall find a judge in North Carolina who will grant such an order, I wish to say that my voice would be in favor of making an example of him at the June session of the legislature.

This is the first threat I ever heard made against the judiciary by any man who had sense enough to keep out of the fire. If any lawyer while practicing before this eminent jurist, when he wore the judicial ermine, had made use of any such language touching the rulings of this judge, he would have been put in jail under contempt proceedings. This only shows how great, strong men can be swept off their base by a tempest of political hatred.

This very act is a part of the legislation of the general assembly of 1899, which attempted to legislate Republicans out of office and put Democrats in, and which the supreme court of the State have declared unconstitutional. The suggestion has already recently been made, I am informed by a judge in North Carolina, that at the June session the constitutional amendment act may itself be amended so as to require the whole act to be construed together, and if any part of it falls the whole shall fall. This is a novel judicial idea, and, in all probabilty, was never suggested before in the world's history. Such an amendment carries with it a suspicion of its constitutionality and suggests what the law writers say of "earmarks of fraud."

But among the suggestions of judges and ex-judges about impeachments and amendments in furtherance of justice, it is to be regretted that no legislation has ever been suggested for the June legislature as an additional safeguard to the right of the voter against the probable injustice to registrars under the new election law. All of these ingenious devices and schemes are claimed to be necessary to protect white men in the exercise of the elective franchise. I have a sort of lurking suspicion that in the minds of the friends of these oppressive and unconstitutional measures the interest of one great political party is to be cared for to the exclusion of the rights of all other citizens.

The election law of 1895 was an absolutely fair one. There could be fewer opportunities for fraud under that law than any the State has ever had. Of course no law can provide against violence and fraud. The happiest thing that could happen to this Republic, in order to prevent lynchings and assassinations, would be the quickening of the public conscience, so that every State would provide an election machinery by which every elector could have his vote deposited in the ballot box and counted as cast. These proposed election methods in North Carolina are a standing insult to every intelligent white man in the State, when properly considered.

The conditions which obtain in South Carolina, Mississippi, and Alabama, and which is the excuse for election laws and methods by which only a very small per cent of the white people of those States participate in elections, are totally unfitted for North Carolina. There are probably 80,000 white Republicans and Populists in North Carolina, who under the constitutional requirements are legal electors, and who represent as much intelligence and wealth as any other 80,000 citizens of the State.

North Carolinians, white men of North Carolina, will protest against these methods. Should they slumber until they lose their rights, we can only look for an increased number of lynchings and assassinations in exact proportion to the unjust abridgment of the rights of an elector. If by a denial of the rights of the elector to vote, under this unconstitutional act we shall have lost a republican form of government, it will then become the duty of Congress to correct it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in the Constitution of the United States that "the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government." Here the word "State" means the people thereof. It is a power to be exercised in favor of the people of a State against the State government itself. This power has been called the sleeping lion. It is a high compliment to our form of government that this power in the Constitution, this sleeping lion, has peacefully slumbered for the first century of our nation's life.

Still it is a power which the fathers and builders of this nation early and wisely saw the necessity of leaving in the Federal Constitution, to be used by Congress whenever the tyrannical hand of the governing power of the State, by the fraud or force of any State agency, had denied the people of such State the right and blessing of a government, republican in form.

This power, with all other powers in the Federal Constitution, we have sworn to execute whenever it is necessary to do so to secure the citizen in the blessings of a republican form of government. Suppose the conscience of the nation should be quickened on this vital question and Congress called upon to perform duties to the people of any State, and in an investigation by Congress touching this most vital question it should appear that more than one-half the qualified electors of the State were denied the privilege of voting, what would be the duty of Congress? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HILL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

A bill (S. 349) granting an increase of pension to James H. Coventon; and

A bill (S. 343) granting a pension to Mary J. Freeman.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 23.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,000 copies, additional to the usual number, of the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska for 1899," of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to print the continuation of my remarks, including this opinion, in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi was recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman has not ten minutes remaining. The Chair looked around upon that side of the House, and not seeing any member rise, he recognized the gentleman from Mississippi in his own right.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if there is a single question now before the American people or apt to come before them at any time which ought to be considered and discussed calmly, without excitement or acrimony, it is the question as to how about seven States of this American Union can preserve the sacredness of the Constitution of the United States inviolate and at the same time prevent the submergence of civilization itself, the "fruit of all the ages," from perhaps the bare letter of the Constitution.

I do not blame the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] much, because he can not know what he says; he can not measure English when he speaks; he does not mean what he says; he does not fathom the significance of his own words. He referred here a moment ago to a debate at Winona, in my State, between my friend and colleague, Hon. JOHN M. ALLEN, and the present Senator-elect from the State of Mississippi, Mr. McLaurin—a debate in regard to which a paper in Mississippi said it was sorry to see the campaign starting off with such acrimony.

But I can tell the gentleman that neither there nor in any other place in the State of Mississippi, during the most turbulent times upon the stump, has any man ever stood and branded those who differed with him and those who were discussing questions with him as "asses," which is what the gentleman did in this high place today. Had that sort of thing taken place in the State of Mississippi, then, perhaps, he might have been excused there upon the ground which I take in excusing him here—that he does not understand the force and power of the English language, but merely opens his mouth and lets come what words will and lets them fall where they may. Nobody else would have been excused at all.

Mr. LINNEY. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not brand anyone in the way he says.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I heard it. When some gentleman wanted to interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina, he said, "Oh, I did not refer to you; I referred to another ass." That is what he said; it is in the RECORD, and will be found there to-morrow unless he revises it out. The remark was out of order, and the gentleman ought to have been called to order. But I do not care about that; I have nothing to do with it except to mention it in connection with your criticism of the Winona debate. I was at Winona the day of that debate. I heard that discussion. It was somewhat acrimonious. There was, however, nothing personally insulting in it. It was in a Democratic primary campaign. It had nothing to do with the general election. There were no colored people there. It was a matter within our own camp; and my friend JOHN ALLEN and my other friend Mr. McLaurin trod rather closely upon each other's toes.

But, leaving that all out, the gentleman says that these lynchings of which he complains have grown up because the people were deprived of the right to vote; and he has cited my State as one of the States involved; leaving the inference—perhaps without desiring to do so—that somebody in the State of Mississippi is prevented from voting contrary to law, and that some votes are illegally suppressed. I wish now to state in the presence of God, the great Searcher of Hearts—and I believe that I know something about the State of Mississippi—that since the great popular uprising in the latter seventies, there has never been, so far as I know, a man prevented illegally from voting in the State of Mississippi nor a vote suppressed.

I will go further and say that no man has ever been defeated for an office in the State of Mississippi within the last ten years who has ever even alleged that he was defeated either by fraud or force. I lay that statement down here as my own, made upon my personal responsibility as a gentleman of integrity and honor.

I have heard enough of these insinuations. Mississippians are proud of Mississippi. She has nothing to be ashamed of. We rush to her defense not because she needs it, but because we love her. May my tongue cleave to my mouth when I refuse or fail to voice that pride and that love. Mississippi has attempted to suppress by legal means her illiterate and her criminal vote—whether white or black—by means of provisions in her constitution which have been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, which court has held that not a single one of those provisions is obnoxious to the charge of violating the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman read some figures; he did not have them accurate; I will give them right. There were 119,000 men of voting age in the State of Mississippi by the census of 1890. At the last general election there were 48,000 votes cast, but that was not much over one-third of the men who were upon the registered list and entitled to vote and who did vote in the Democratic primaries. Why did they not vote at the general election? Because there was no organized Republican party; because there was no Populist party having any hope of success. Consequently, the great majority of the people did not turn out. I see before me my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY], and I am always glad to see him, for there is no franker or better man in the House.

Now, I call attention to the fact that in that same year, 1890, Connecticut had 224,000 legal voters and cast only 125,000 votes. Were these 99,000 votes "suppressed" in Connecticut? You and I know they were not. I see also before me a friend from Massachusetts, and I wish to say that Massachusetts had 665,000 voters in 1890 and cast only 285,000 votes. Were nearly 400,000 "suppressed" in Massachusetts? Absurd!

If it be true that votes are "suppressed" whenever they happen not to come out, then more votes were suppressed in Massachusetts than in Mississippi, and about the same number were suppressed in Connecticut. With voters in the State of Mississippi it is the same as with men everywhere—they vote when it is necessary, and they do not vote when it is unnecessary.

And now the gentleman from North Carolina has also spoken of Mississippi as one State which had been "much troubled with lynching." I deny it, sir. Mississippi has had as few lynchings as almost any State in this Union. But I will say to the gentleman now, and I will say to the American people of this country, through this House, that whereas Mississippians have sometimes violated the law—and nobody regrets it more than the great body of the people themselves—while they have sometimes had "lynching bees," while they have sometimes lynched men for murder, for arson, for rape, Mississippi has never shot down anybody because he wanted to work. [Applause.]

Why, I remember when a man was tied to the stake and burned in the State of New York for the crime of rape. It was after I came to the Congress of the United States. I remember when the passions of the people got the better of them, as now and then they will, even amongst the best people, in the State of Illinois here not long ago, when they shot down a huddled crowd of helpless negroes simply because they wanted to work. Would you indict the people of Illinois on that account? Would you indict the community on that account, even the community in which the thing took place? No fair-minded man will. Human nature is the same all over the world.

When Judge Lynch presided in California, he presided because the people had reached the conclusion that there were certain crimes there that could not be reached by any other method. I think they were mistaken, and I think people are nearly always mistaken when they come to that conclusion. But lynching has no geographical boundaries in this country. Mississippi had one lynching not long ago. It occurred in my district. Now, my friends, I want to tell you about it, not in justification, but in extenuation and explanation, and I want each man, when I tell him the facts in that case, to probe his own heart and to ask himself if the veneer of civilization that is upon all of us would not have been scratched clear through and if perhaps he himself would not have gone with the crowd that did the lynching under the excitement of the moment?

A man leaves his home—a farmer. He goes down to the little town of Canton to market and sell his crop. It is rumored in the neighborhood that he had brought money from the market town the week before and that it is in the house. That night six or seven negro men break into that house, ravish his daughter and his wife, and then they manacle and tie them together, and not only them but the little children—one of them, I believe, four or five years of age—manacle them down in the center of that house and set it on fire and burn them all up, hoping that the fire had done away with all trace of the crime.

One of the negroes happened to have a peculiar foot, which led to tracking him. That led to crimination and recrimination among the criminals and to a confession. It led to confessions from others. The people arose and lynched those men, and while they were lynching them they burned one of them, a voice coming from the crowd that he ought to receive the punishment himself which he had meted out to this innocent, helpless woman, her helpless daughters, and her helpless little children. It was a negro who, filled with indignation, asked and obtained the privilege of setting the match to the pyre.

Now, my friends, I have no word of justification for lynching or for violation of law anywhere as a general thing, but if the good God, sitting in the chancel of Heaven, possessing a wider observation than you and I, forgives, as I believe He does, those things that are generally wrong but which under particular circumstances are provoked so that human nature can not resist, then I believe that the men who engaged in that lynching are much more clear, in the sight of God to-day and in the sight of good men everywhere, of any crime than any man can possibly be who denounces lynching without also denouncing at the same time the crime which has led to it. [Applause.] Ah, my friends, the gentleman would have you believe that a horrible state of affairs exists down in the dear State of Mississippi. And yet every day these colored people that he says are oppressed in the State of Mississippi are leaving North Carolina, and leaving Georgia, and leaving Alabama, and seeking the State of Mississippi. A hundred thousand of them have gone there this year.

Legally disfranchised as they are when they can not read and write, legally disfranchised as they are when they do not pay their taxes, or are guilty of certain crimes, yet they have left these other places where no complaint is made of the administration of the suffrage and have come to the State of Mississippi, knowing one thing, that there they get absolute equality before the law and the even administration of justice and in every other way right treatment, good wages, and the opportunity to labor. I have heard it said sometimes that the difference between the South and the North upon the negro question is that in the South the negro many times can not vote, while in the North there are very few things except voting that he can do. Your trades unions do not let him work with you in certain places; there are certain pursuits that he is not even allowed to carry on in others. Down in Mississippi you will find the black man and white man working side by side and earning their daily wage, whether as brick masons or carpenters or what not.

Now, my friends, this is not the occasion, and God knows this great and seemingly to me, at times, insoluble problem ought never to be the occasion of any man's attempt to make political capital one way or the other out of it; and yet I am prone to believe that at the bottom of this entire speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] lies this thought and motive, viz, that if the illiterate vote, the incapable vote, and the incompetent vote—the ignorant and criminal vote—of the State of North Carolina is once ruled out by legislation or constitutional enactment, in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, though it may be, the gentleman and men like him will have played out their short scene upon the political stage of this country and be retired to private life.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow me one question there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. LINNEY. As a lawyer I trust your legal intelligence. Do you believe that that law that I read, which is proposed to be put upon us in North Carolina, is constitutional?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I did not even hear it. I do not know what the law is. I was thinking about another matter altogether and did not hear him read it. Therefore I do not know whether it is or is not unconstitutional. But the laws of Mississippi which you criticise are constitutional; and I do say this, and I say it to every one of you; I say it to the bitterest partisan Republican on this floor—and I know some of them who are excellent men personally and who are brave and fair—I say this to you, that when it comes to a choice between an abstract theory to the effect that all "featherless bipeds" are equal, contradicting the common-sense observation of common-sense men, and some constitutional or legal method of preserving from the operation of this theory civilization itself, higher than law even, because law is but the exponent and the expression of it, then every good man in the United States ought to be glad to see any Southern State solve that question so as to preserve civilization, so as to preserve the "gains of our race" that have been made through countless ages of bitter struggle with hard nature and harder men—the civilization developed in the very fiber of our race, in the school foreordained by the "God in history" as the only school for its development, the school of historic experience and evolution.

Mr. KLUTTZ. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] asked you if you believed that the election law of North Carolina is constitutional.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know nothing about it.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I desire to say as a North Carolinian and as a lawyer that in my opinion and in the opinion of the best lawyers of North Carolina it is entirely constitutional, and the gentleman has a Republican supreme court to which he could appeal instead of this forum, if he honestly believed it was unconstitutional. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not meant to weary the House. One other thing. When questions of this sort are brought before the country and before the House it frequently happens, as the gentleman has insinuated, that Southern men seem to fly all to pieces at once and to become excited. I have heard many people state that. But if you will consider for a moment the conditions down there, the comparative isolation of the white population out in the country; that their very life itself—social order, property rights, the purity of their women, all things, are at stake, then Southern men may be excused for being somewhat in earnest when this question is touched upon. We are in earnest, and awfully in earnest, and we have made up our minds that we are going to save the heritage of liberty and civilization for ourselves and for our children at almost any possible hazard.

I do not believe that you regret that we have made up our minds to that effect. I believe that many of you only regret one thing in connection with this question, and that is that in obedience to a mere abstract theory you tried to legislate into political and social equality two races, one of which had had about two hundred years, at the furthest, of opportunity to make something out of itself by evolution and by heredity, and the other of which had gathered to itself from all the climes of the world, from all the treasure houses of thought, and of beauty—from literature, art, and law all things of historic preciousness and worth; had made its own—a part of itself—a part of itself before the integer was born to live his short span of individual life—all that sounds to the names of liberty and of law, of order, of civilization, of high thinking, of noble feeling, and nobler endeavor. I believe that at the bottom of your hearts many of you think that was a mistake. Whether you do so or not, I think so; and I am frank to say it here or anywhere else on the face of this globe. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to inquire, Mr. Chairman, how the time has been occupied between the two sides.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. An hour and forty-five minutes has been occupied upon that side of the House, and an hour and sixteen minutes on the other side of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I suggest this to my friend——

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to that, fifteen minutes were occupied by unanimous consent upon that side of the House, making two hours. For that reason the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman from Texas will permit me, I desire to suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has a matter that he desires to dispose of this evening, and that you could occupy, for instance, half an hour.

Mr. LITTLE. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Forty-five minutes. Could the gentleman dispose of it after that time?

Mr. CANNON. I think so, but I would be very glad to have a reasonably full House for ten minutes after the gentleman gets through.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the gentleman from Texas object to our rising now and disposing of the urgent deficiency bill? Then we could go back into committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How long will that require?

Mr. CANNON. I should say probably about ten minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LITTLE. Let the gentleman go ahead for forty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for forty-five minutes.

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I neglected to reserve the balance of the time to which I was entitled. I desire to reserve it and yield it to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi desires to reserve the remainder of his time. If there be no objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, including some documents—not very extensive.

Mr. LITTLE. I suggest that a similar privilege be extended to all persons who have spoken on that subject.

Mr. PAYNE. If that be done, there ought to be some limit of time.

Mr. LITTLE. Say within five days.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that anything beyond the extension of leave upon the request of individual members is a matter for the House. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration House bill No. 7433 (the Indian appropriation bill), had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all general debate on the Indian appropriation bill be closed at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, and that the time be equally divided between the two sides, that on the Democratic side to be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and that on the Republican side by myself.

Mr. LITTLE. I suggest that, owing to the number of gentlemen on this side desiring to speak, we fix 4 o'clock instead of 3. I think that will better accommodate gentlemen on this side.

Mr. GAINES. I hope that will be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I modify my request so as to close debate at 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, that the time be equally divided between the two sides, and be controlled on the one side by himself and on the other by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

There was no objection.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

CORRECTION OF RECORD—ADMIRAL DEWEY'S LETTER.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a correction in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings. On the last line of column 1, page 1356, in giving Admiral Dewey's letter I observe it says:

I never treated him as an ally except to make use of him and the soldiers.

The word in the letter, which very likely I misread, and which was copied also wrongly by the press, is "natives" instead of "soldiers." In order that the correction may clearly appear, I ask that the letter may be reprinted correctly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL, 1747 RHODE ISLAND AVENUE,
Washington, January 30, 1900.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: The statement of Emilio Aguinaldo, as recently published in the Springfield Republican, so far as it relates to me, is a tissue of falsehoods. I never promised him, directly or indirectly, independence for the Filipinos; I never treated him as an ally, except to make use of him and the natives to assist me in my operations against the Spaniards. He never uttered the word independence in any conversation with me or my officers.

The statement that I received him with military honors or saluted the so-called Filipino flag is absolutely false.

Sincerely, yours, GEORGE DEWEY.

REPORTS OF SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting a full and complete account of all property, including the stationery, belonging to the United States in his possession on the 31st day of January, 1900; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting a full and complete statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate, showing in detail the items of expense under the proper appropriations, the aggregate thereof, and exhibiting the exact condition of all public moneys received, paid out, and remaining in his possession, from July 1, 1899, to January 31, 1900; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CAPE NOME DISTRICT, ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d ultimo, a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, inclosing a report on the investigations made by the Geological Survey in the Cape Nome district of Alaska; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF DISTRICT RAILWAYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual reports of the Capital Traction Railway Company, the Great Falls Electric Railway Company, the City and Suburban Railway Company, the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company, the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Brightwood Railway Company, the Columbia Railway Company, and the Metropolitan Railroad Company, all of the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PRIVILEGES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege and to make a parliamentary inquiry.

I notice by an examination of the RECORD of the proceedings of the House of Representatives during last week frequent references to myself, with the charge that if I had taken pains to do so I might have revealed certain things pertaining to the domestic and personal affairs of certain citizens of my State, and that I might have revealed, if I had desired to do so, things startling to the moral sentiment of the country, and especially to the moral sensibilities of the members of the House of Representatives.

The question of parliamentary inquiry which I make is whether such allusions made by members of the House concerning a member of this body are a breach of the privileges of the Senate and a violation of the courtesies due by members of one branch of Congress to those of the other, and if they be a breach of such privilege and a violation of such courtesies, what, if any, remedy exists; whether it would also be a breach of the courtesies due by members of the Senate to the members of the House to make reply in the Senate to such allusions made in the House and correct what a member here might conceive to be aspersions upon the character of the people whom he in part represents or upon himself.

I understand that it would be such breach of privilege, but I should like an expression from the Chair upon these questions so that I may govern myself accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If a Senator were making an attack upon any member of the other branch of the House the Presiding Officer would feel it to be his duty to call him to order, it being a violation, in his judgment, of propriety and of courtesy.

The same rule would undoubtedly prevail in the House, and any member of the House who was making an attack upon a member of the other branch of Congress ought, in my judgment—I think I will not say that—it is for the Speaker of the House or members of the House to determine for themselves whether or not he is committing a breach and ought to be called to order.

As to what can be said in either House in relation to what has taken place in the other there is no rule of the Senate, of course, and the Secretary will read what Jefferson's Manual says in relation to it.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only restriction which is laid down in the Manual, and there is no rule, of course, of the Senate relating to the matter.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I understand such to be the case, and I made the inquiry so that my silence here in regard to statements concerning myself and the people whom I represent can not and must not be taken by the country as any admission of the truth of any such statements.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will administer the oath to the recently appointed Secretary of the Senate.

The oath having been administered to Mr. CHARLES G. BENNETT, he took his seat at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States and the House of Representatives be notified of the election of CHARLES G. BENNETT as Secretary of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Dr. J. V. Laddey and 13 other citizens of Arlington, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a veterinary corps in the United States Army equal to that in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Meyer and sundry other druggists of Sleepy Eye, Minn., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an appropriation be made to continue the exhibit of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a petition signed by Charles H. Aldrich and 18 other members of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, calling attention to the urgent need of better quarters for the Law Library of Congress.

The petition should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I suppose, or possibly to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALDRICH. That matter is now before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it go to that committee, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ROSS presented the petition of D. K. Simonds, chairman, F. B. Randall, secretary, and 8 committeemen of the Bennington County (Vt.) Fourth-Class Postmasters' Association, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the salaries of fourth-class postmasters; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MASON presented a memorial of Pomona Grange, No. 33, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peoria County, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 727) to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Pomona Grange, No. 33, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peoria County, Ill., praying for the establishment of postal savings banks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of Pomona Grange, No. 33, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peoria County, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation retarding the circulation of United States currency known as greenbacks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas presented a petition of the town council of the incorporated town of Muscogee, Ind. T., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the construction of waterworks and the issuance of bonds therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER presented the memorial of H. W. Meyer and 11 other citizens of Appleton, Wis., relative to neutrality; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of the Woman's Club, of Monroe Lodge, No. 72, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the Monroe Ministerial Association, of Ivanhoe Lodge, No. 41, Knights of Pythias, and of the Woman's Relief Corps, all of Monroe, in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation to limit and control vivisection in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying for the ratification of a reciprocity treaty with Canada; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Greenwich, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying that an appropriation be made to maintain the Philadelphia Commercial Museum at Philadelphia, Pa.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the regimental secretaries, held at Hartford, Conn., favoring the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 216) introduced by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], to correct the record of certain soldiers of the United States, to submit an adverse report thereon. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 744) for the relief of John Emerson, late a private in Company I, Nineteenth Maine Infantry, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2085) for the correction of the military record of Francis A. E. Briot, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TURNER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2112) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the salaries of the deputy collectors of customs at the subports of Tacoma and Seattle, in the State of Washington, and repealing all laws inconsistent therewith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TURLEY, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1008) for the relief of William C. Dodge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1040) to amend section 4445 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the licensing of officers of steam vessels, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1331) granting an increase of pension to Ellen C. Abbott; and

A bill (S. 2375) granting a pension to Mary A. Russell.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1475) to complete the establishment and erection of a military post near the city of Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming, and making appropriation therefor, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill (S. 1560) granting an honorable discharge to James Brown was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is ascertained that a bill to that effect was passed at a previous Congress and that the discharge has been issued. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2477) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 819) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Bourne;

A bill (S. 833) granting an increase of pension to Henry Atkinson; and

A bill (S. 820) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Anna M. Deitzler.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2082) for the relief of the children of Matthew J. J. Cagle, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 54) donating a condemned captured cannon to the Commandery in Chief of the Sons of Veterans, United States of America, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., reported it with amendments.

SHIP CANAL IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. McBRIDE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER], on the 29th ultimo, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

The concurrent resolution was ordered to be placed on the Calendar, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made and an estimate submitted of the cost of constructing a ship canal to connect Puget Sound with Grays Harbor, via the Chehalis River, in the State of Washington, in accordance with recommendations heretofore made and filed with the War Department.

ALLEGED FRAUD IN THE PENSION ROLL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have here the report of the committee on political reform of the Union League Club of New York, which conducted an inquiry under the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on political reform be requested to inquire into and report to this club upon the nature of the charges of fraud in the pension rolls of the United States, the means which may be practicable to ascertain the truth or falsity of the charges, the methods available for remedying the evil, if it exists, and whether and in what way this club may contribute towards those ends.

Under that resolution a committee of the Union League Club made an inquiry and submitted a calm and dispassionate report on this subject, which I feel sure will be of interest to the Senate, and as it is brief I ask that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is their objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McENERY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2858) to amend the bounty laws granting bounties to soldiers, sailors, their widows and minor children; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SIMON introduced a bill (S. 2866) permitting citizens of the United States, bona fide residents of the States of California, Oregon, and Washington, to fell and remove, for building, agricultural, mining, and other domestic purposes, timber growing or being upon the mineral lands of the United States in the States aforesaid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2867) to extend certain acts of Congress in reference to municipal indebtedness for public purposes to the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 2868) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Grand Junction, in the State of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TURNER introduced a bill (S. 2869) authorizing the Cape Nome Transportation, Bridge and Development Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Washington and authorized to do business in the Territory of Alaska, to construct a traffic bridge across the Snake River, at Nome City, in the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2870) concerning disbursing officers of the Subsistence Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2871) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Company and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SULLIVAN introduced a bill (S. 2872) for the relief of the estate of Nancy Barrow, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DEPEW introduced a bill (S. 2873) for the relief of John Pope Hodnett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2874) granting an increase of pension to Dr. John W. Cook; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2875) to amend an act of Congress dated June 28, 1898, so as to provide for an additional enrollment of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek Indians, now residing in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 2876) granting a pension to Charles F. Wise; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2877) for the relief of the estate of William Harris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2878) to remove the charge of desertion from the name of William H. Campbell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2879) granting a pension to Mary E. Griffiths; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2880) granting an increase of pension to Caroline B. Bradford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2881) granting a pension to Mary A. Parker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2882) to authorize the Cambridge Bridge Commission to construct a drawless bridge across the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PETTIGREW (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 81) suspending proceedings in the courts of the Indian Territory and before the Indian agent, pending the enactment of legislation now before Congress wherein the possessory rights of the Indians herein named are involved; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO BILL TO PREVENT FOOD ADULTERATION.

Mr. McBRIDE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2426) to prevent the manufacture of adulterated foods; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

USE OF THE ROENTGEN RAY.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of a document entitled "The use of the Roentgen ray by the Medical Department of the United States Army in the war with Spain (1898)," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

CLAIMS UNDER CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY ACT.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 additional copies of Senate Report No. 11, first session Fifty-sixth Congress, being the report on Senate bill 602, "A bill to revise and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof."

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, that is simply to print extra copies of a report, and I have been requested by several Senators to ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution, and ask to have it read and lie on the table. To-morrow morning I shall wish to speak to the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a paper entitled "The Philippine Commission" be printed as a document for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the resolution lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS OF NAVAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. PETTUS. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to inform the Senate whether the Navy Department has or has not refused or neglected to communicate to the Court of Claims any information concerning proceedings of naval courts-martial on the call of said court, under section 1076 of the Revised Statutes; and if so, his reasons for such refusal or neglect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not quite like that form of direction to an eminent public officer, to ask him whether he has not neglected something.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know where the resolution came from, but I should like to suggest to whatever Senator offered it that he omit——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was submitted by the junior Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Alabama if he will not strike out the word "neglected." It seems to me it is hardly a courteous tone of address to ask an eminent public officer, the head of a Department, have you not neglected to do so, and, if you have, why did you neglect it?

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the only object of inserting the word "neglected" was because my information is that no notice was taken of the call by the court. I would just as soon use the word "omitted" or any other word to indicate that it was not done.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator to amend the language by inserting the word "refrained" instead of the words "refused or neglected," which would cover both.

Mr. PETTUS. I have no objection to inserting the word "refrained" instead of "neglected."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified. As modified, is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule, and it will be printed.

CAPE NOME DISTRICT, ALASKA.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 25,000 extra copies of the report of the Director of the Geological Survey submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, relating to the Cape Nome district, in Alaska, with maps accompanying the same, 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Authority is hereby granted to the Public Printer to have the maps accompanying this report engraved and printed by the Geological Survey or by contract.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 extra copies of Senate Document No. 62 of the last Congress, entitled "Affairs in the Philippine Islands."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes; recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agrees to the same with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26; agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1092) to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office;

A bill (H. R. 7739) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) to provide for pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps.

TRANSACTIONS WITH NEW YORK CITY BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolutions of inquiry dated January 4 and 23, 1900, concerning certain transactions between the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I simply wish to make an inquiry. Day before yesterday I introduced a resolution to print a certain document and that resolution was not considered yesterday. Do I understand that that resolution goes to the Calendar and is not now to be laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes to the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I had supposed it was understood that it should have a day for discussion, and as there was no opportunity yesterday to discuss that resolution, I presumed that it would come up this morning. The ruling of the Chair is undoubtedly correct, and I yield to it. I had expected it would come before the Senate this morning, but I have another resolution introduced which will enable me to speak to the same subject to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN rose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not informed as to the purpose of the Senator from Nebraska in seeking to have the pending resolution adopted, but I would suggest to that Senator that the resolutions referred to have not been referred to the Committee on Finance, that they were adopted by the Senate without any reference. Certain answers have been returned to the resolutions, and those responses in the ordinary course of business have been referred to the Committee on Finance. So the resolution in the form it now stands, if it should be adopted, would be inoperative.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, it is very gratifying to know that of course the resolution would be inoperative if adopted, and it is extremely gratifying to me to be set right by the Senator from Rhode Island. I suppose that these answers are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Finance by the order of the Senate, and that it becomes their duty to take some action in the way of a report to the Senate, either requesting an investigation of the charges made or recommending a postponement of the entire matter. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island frankly that I want the Senate to get jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the resolutions for the express purpose of introducing a resolution for an investigation of the transactions between the Treasury Department and the National City Bank and the Hanover Bank of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska, on which the Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have no desire to carry this matter any further than the facts will warrant. I have no dislike for the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no desire to persecute him, and I shall not do so. I only want to know the truth of the relations between the Treasury Department and the national banks of New York and other sections of the country. I hoped this resolution would be permitted to pass without any discussion. But if I am to be met here with an objection, and if obstructions are to be thrown in the pathway of the investigation, I shall feel it my duty this morning to make a brief analysis of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, so that the people at least may know the attitude of the Treasury Department respecting a tremendous sum of money now in the hands of the National City Bank and other favored financial institutions of the country.

On the 4th of January I had the honor to introduce a resolution of inquiry which was adopted by the Senate and sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, who on the 10th of January responded in a letter known as Document No. 71, first session Fifty-sixth Congress. That response, in my judgment, was not full and complete. On the 23d of January I introduced another resolution calling attention to some omitted matter, and the Secretary responded to that a few days ago, disclosing nothing new.

Referring to Document 71, I wish to call attention to some peculiarities appearing in it. The first letter of the correspondence submitted by the Secretary shows the motives which actuated the Treasury Department in conferring a favor upon the National City Bank. It is that written by Vice-President A. B. Hepburn of the bank to Mr. Gage, and is found on page 60 of Mr. Gage's reply, as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 5, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any changes which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We should like to remain a United States depository, as at present. Of course the bank is very strong—

And I call attention to this particular language—and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors, you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. HEPBURN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

There is no reply to this letter in the correspondence submitted by Mr. Gage. The list of directors of the National City Bank referred to are H. O. Havemeyer, president of the sugar trust; James H. Post, broker of sugar trust and director National Sugar Refining Company; William Rockefeller, president of the Standard Oil Company; Stephen S. Palmer, national zinc trust; Robert Bacon, member of firm of J. Pierpont Morgan, bond syndicate, also director in copper trust; Samuel Sloan, director in number of railroads; H. Walter Webb, then vice-president of the New York Central Railroad (the Vanderbilt directors were the largest individual subscribers to the McKinley campaign fund); W. D. Sloan, banker and Vanderbilt representative; Jacob H. Schiff, chairman of the Union Pacific Refunding Syndicate; Cleveland H. Dodge, of copper trust and director in the Copper Queen Consolidated Company.

Those persons we know from the record were directors of this bank at the time referred to by Mr. Hepburn in his letter. It would appear, from the manner in which deposits were increased in the National City Bank after the receipt of the Hepburn letter, that Secretary Gage had taken the pains to look over the list of directors of the bank and had become impressed with the services which they might have rendered in the campaign of 1896.

The official reports show that the Government deposits in the National City Bank were only $200,000 on May 14, 1897—less than a month previous to the receipt of the Hepburn letter. After the receipt of the Hepburn letter, not quite a month, the National City Bank received of the $58,000,000 in settlement of the Union Pacific debt the enormous sum of $24,000,000. This would apparently indicate the effect which the reading of Mr. Hepburn's letter had upon the Treasury Department.

On July 14, 1896, the Government money on deposit in the National City Bank was $19,579,000. On September 20, 1899, the balance was $29,000,000. In floating the war loan of $200,000,000, in July, 1898, in which 318 banks participated, the National City Bank received $14,000,000. On July 8, 1899, the balance was $10,500,000, showing that the bank had the free use of over $10,000,000 for over six months.

Mr. Gage's reply does not indicate that there was any correspondence with the bank from June 5, 1897, to October 20, 1897, and in his later reports he says that there is no record of any correspondence between those dates, but he does not say in specific terms that no correspondence took place.

The National City Bank, after being informed that it would be used as a depositary for the Union Pacific debt, immediately made inquiries as to how much it would receive. Vice-President Hepburn, in a letter to Secretary Gage, dated October 27, 1897, page 61 of the record, says:

If not presuming too much, we would be greatly obliged for a suggestion from you as to the amount of bonds which it would be good judgment for us to acquire at the present time, this move on our part being quite as much in the public interest (in the prevention of any money stringency) as it is in our own interest as bankers.

It is apparent that the amount of money received by the Treasury from the sale of this property will considerably exceed the amount of currency sixes maturing on January 1 next, and it is in the hope that a considerable portion of these funds will be left with the banks for a sufficient length of time to afford a reasonable profit that we undertake the expense of procuring the necessary bonds to qualify us as a depository.

Mr. SPOONER. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. ALLEN. From page 61. In reply to Mr. Hepburn the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 61 also, under date of October 28, 1897, assured him that the money would remain for some time. He said:

I have expressed a preference for your institution as the original recipient and distributer of the fund.

Mr. ALDRICH. On what page is that?

Mr. ALLEN. On page 61.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the date?

Mr. ALLEN. It is under date of October 28, 1897.

Mr. ALDRICH. When was the Hepburn letter written?

Mr. ALLEN. June 5, I think.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean to say that it was not answered until October?

Mr. ALLEN. Look at the document and you will see no answer there.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator was reading what purported to be an answer.

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I so understood him.

Mr. SPOONER. It is another Hepburn letter.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; it is another Hepburn letter.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, I did not understand that.

Mr. ALLEN. The letter continues:

In reply to your inquiry, or rather expression of hope, that a suitable portion of the fund will be left with the bank for a sufficient length of time to offer a reasonable profit to cover the expense in procuring the necessary bonds to qualify as a depositary, I can only say that, while we can make no specific promises in that direction, the purpose we have in using depositary banks for the fund, namely, to save disturbance of the money market, will induce us to practice wise discretion in covering the money into the Treasury proper. There probably will be no disbursements from the fund until January 1, when, as you know, $30,000,000 will be disbursed in redemption of the outstanding Government sixes maturing on that day.

Mr. President, that is a most remarkable letter—a most remarkable request in the first instance and a most remarkable reply in the second instance. The Secretary of the Treasury discloses in his answer that the sole purpose of putting the money in that bank was to comply with the request of Mr. Hepburn that the money of the United States should remain on deposit there for the private interests of that institution. Mr. Stillman, the president of the National City Bank, was well pleased with this favor, as will be seen from a letter dated October 30, 1897, addressed to Mr. Gage, and which is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, October 30, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 28th, and wish to express my appreciation of your kind consideration in selecting this bank as the original recipient and distributor of the depository funds. We will qualify by making ample deposit of bonds in the near future.

Mr. Henry W. Cannon also communicated to us your desire in the premises, and the local arrangements will proceed accordingly.

What those local arrangements were the Secretary of the Treasury does not see fit to disclose.

I note with pleasure the contents of your letter received this morning with reference to the length of time which these deposits will be allowed to remain. Your banking experience enables you to appreciate our position, and we fully realize that such consideration will be accorded as may be consistent with your official duties.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Secretary Gage, in writing to "the vice-president of the National City Bank" (page 63 of the record, dated November 2, 1897), says:

* * * It is expected you will then be able to promptly qualify by forwarding the necessary bonds.

As indicating the unusual proportion of Government deposits which were being placed with the National City Bank, the following letter from Secretary Gage to the president of the National City Bank (page 66 of the reply) is significant. It reads:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 13, 1897.

SIR: This office has received your letter of the 12th instant, concerning the probable amount of the sum of $13,645,350 which will remain with your bank after distributing a portion of the deposit to each of the banks specially designated to receive deposits on account of proceeds of sale of the Union Pacific Railroad.

In reply, you are informed that the exact amount can not now be stated. Eight banks in New York have been specially designated for this purpose, with security aggregating $22,600,000; of this amount your bank will have furnished $15,000,000, and, therefore, if all the banks furnish the amount for which they are designated, your share of the first deposit above referred to would be $4/11, or something over $2,000,000; if any of the banks fail to furnish full amount designated, the amount remaining in your bank would be proportionately greater.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

From this letter it appears that although eight banks were to participate in the distribution of this fund, the National City Bank was to receive $9,000,000 of the aggregate sum of thirteen and one-half millions. Mr. Gage, manifesting great interest in possible disturbances of the money market, wrote the bank as follows, as will be found on page 75:

In such a case the withdrawal from general bank funds into the subtreasury would be about $4,000,000. If this would operate to disturb the market at all and you thought it advisable to furnish, say, $4,000,000 more in bonds as security for deposits, we could order one-half of the payment to be made on the 27th by K. L. & Co. deposited with you.

That the National City Bank was anxious to take advantage of this deposit of $4,000,000 is shown by the fact that on December 20 a telegram was sent to Secretary Gage stating that bonds to secure the amount would be deposited immediately.

On December 20, 1897 (page 75 of the reply), Vice-President Hepburn wrote the following letter to Secretary Gage, in which he endeavored to show that the withdrawal of $4,000,000 would have a disturbing influence upon the market. The letter is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, December 20, 1897.

DEAR SIR: We are this morning in receipt of your letter of the 18th, saying, with reference to the absorption by the Treasury on the 27th instant of the next payment to be made by the Union Pacific syndicate: "If this would operate to disturb the market at all, and you thought it advisable to furnish, say, $4,000,000 more in bonds as security for deposits, we could order one-half of the payment to be made on the 27th by K. L. & Co. deposited with you." Call money is 5 per cent here to-day, and the indications point to an increasing stringency. While the deposits of the city are very large, the investments are very large also, and we are confident you will confer a favor upon the business interests by leaving so much of this fund as may be where it is available for current uses. We therefore wired you as follows:

"Replying your letter 18th, this day received, we will make an additional deposit of United States bonds sufficient to entitle us to receive the $4,000,000 deposit"— which we hereby confirm.

We have on deposit with you already $20,800,000 of United States bonds to secure moneys on account of the proceeds of the sale of the Union Pacific Railroad. The amount of moneys in our hands against said bonds is $19,883,652.27, leaving an excess of bonds over deposits of $916,347.73. The amount of deposits with us, you will remember, was reduced by the certification of your checks to the amount of $900,000. Now, I desire to ask whether the deposit of $3,100,000 additional United States bonds would be sufficient to entitle us to receive the $4,000,000 of deposits, or do you want a deposit of the full amount of $4,000,000 of United States bonds in order to entitle us to receive this $4,000,000 additional deposit? In any event, we will deposit bonds enough to cover the $4,000,000, but naturally prefer the lesser amount if the same is permissible.

Very respectfully,

A. B. HEPBURN,
Vice-President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Not satisfied with the arrangements which could be made by letter and telephonic and telegraphic correspondence, President Stillman evidently wanted a personal conference with the Secretary of the Treasury, as the following letter from Mr. Gage, dated December 21, 1897, would indicate (pages 76 and 77 of the reply):

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 21, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 20th instant, and note your suggestion as to a conference with Mr. Morgan in relation to the Treasury deposits in the national bank depositaries of New York.

Right there I want to say that the Secretary of the Treasury did not furnish that letter in the first correspondence submitted by him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in the first, but he did in the second.

Mr. ALLEN. I think he did in the second.

You are being advised to-day, officially, that if you make the necessary deposits of bonds, one-half of the next payment of the Union Pacific road will be deposited with your bank, while the other half, which will be deposited with the subtreasury, will be got back into the street again as quickly as possible through the payment of drafts given in payment of the Government-aid bonds to the Union Pacific road.

Mr. President, I stop to inquire why the Secretary of the Treasury proposed to permit one-half of this tremendous sum of money to rest in the coffers of the National City Bank undisturbed, while he was to draw on the other half deposited in other banks and put that money "back into the street again as quickly as possible;" why he did not put it all back in the street?

There is not much reason to suppose any further transfers will be ordered from the national bank depositaries to the subtreasury before January 1. However, I would like to confer with you or with Mr. Morgan on the general subject, though I think the presence of the latter gentleman here would, perhaps, be more disturbing than an order on the banks to transfer all of their money to the subtreasury. That is, however, a matter for you to consider.

I suppose the presence of Mr. Morgan in the city of Washington in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, according to his judgment as expressed in this letter, would subject them to some suspicion, if not produce a monetary panic; at least he wanted to guard against the effect of having Mr. Morgan in consultation with him in Washington.

Mr. COCKRELL. For fear it might endanger the gold standard.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes. However that may be, he did not seem to be settled——

Mr. SPOONER. What was the observation of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Secretary of the Treasury feared it would create a condition that would endanger the gold standard if Mr. Morgan should come down here to confer with him; that it might create a suspicion in the stock market that the gold standard was in a shaky condition.

Mr. ALLEN. The letter continues:

However that may be, I now advise that I shall go to Philadelphia on Thursday morning, arriving there at 12.54.

They are going to meet at some other place.

I go as the guest of the Bank of North America, the directors of which are giving a small dinner at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. On an intimation from you that you or Mr. Morgan, or any other gentlemen whom you may name, would like to confer with me there, I will go to the Walton and meet him at fifteen minutes past 1. Please let me know by wire affirmatively or negatively as to this, as it may otherwise interfere with the liberty I would enjoy in Philadelphia.

Very truly, yours,

L. J. GAGE.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
The National City Bank, New York City.

The Secretary of the Treasury did not want to meet Mr. Morgan in Washington for some reason undisclosed by his letter, saying that his presence here might create a greater disturbance than an order on the banks transferring the money to the subtreasury; but he sought an interview with Mr. Morgan at the Walton Hotel in Philadelphia shortly after that, and even in Philadelphia he did not want to be seen in company with Mr. Morgan at the small dinner that was to be given to him by the directors of the North American Bank. He was, however, perfectly willing to run off on some side street and meet him quietly at his hotel. I admit the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to do that, but what motive actuated him in making that proposition, and what was to be accomplished by the conference between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Morgan at the Walton Hotel?

The reply to the Senate resolution does not show the letter mentioned by Mr. Gage as "yours of the 20th instant"—that was one of the breaks in this correspondence—nor does it show Mr. Stillman's reply to Mr. Gage's request for a conference with him in Philadelphia; neither does the correspondence submitted to the Senate by Mr. Gage show what understanding or agreement was arrived at at that conference.

Throughout the entire correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Why does the Senator make that statement when the Secretary of the Treasury states that there was no such conference?

Mr. ALLEN. I will come to that in a moment, when I come to analyze the Secretary's second reply.

Throughout the entire correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the officials of the National City Bank there is a tone of familiarity which is totally lacking in the communications with the officials of the Hanover National Bank and that familiarity of address, Mr. President, which, in my judgment, is not proper in official correspondence, such as "My dear Mr. Secretary," "My dear Mr. Gage," "Dear Mr. Secretary," and "Dear Mr. Gage," repeated and very frequently used by Mr. Stillman, the president of this bank, by Vice-President Hepburn of the same institution, and by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It may be said that this is hypercritical, that it is a small thing to talk about; but I submit that such expressions have no place in the official correspondence between a man who is handling more money than any other man living and the institutions with which he is transacting business. They are proper in social life between friends, but they are improper in official correspondence. It only goes to show the familiarity existing between the officials of this bank and the Treasury Department of the United States, and it is important in that respect.

I will insert, without stopping to read it, the letter of Mr. Stillman to Mr. Gage, dated New York, December 23, 1897.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, December 23, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I feel that I ought, perhaps, to explain a little in detail the object sought to be accomplished by the interview mentioned in my letter of recent date, and what the consensus of opinion here seems to be with reference to the course to be pursued as to the special deposits with banks on account of the proceeds of the Union Pacific Railroad.

After the needs of the Government are supplied—which, of course, are paramount to all other considerations—it is, in the opinion of leading financiers, very desirable that as much of the Union Pacific money be left in banks here, where it will be available for commercial uses, as is possible. All of the securities of the reorganized Union Pacific Railroad must be absorbed and assimilated by the public, and at the same time the New York Central, Lake Shore, Chicago and Northwestern, Chicago and Rock Island, and other properties seeking a refunding of their obligations upon a very low interest basis. The success of these reorganization plans will be to place those properties on a firmer financial footing, with fixed charges materially reduced.

With the distrust of American investments growing out of uncertainties attending our currency system, and fear of possibly going upon a silver basis, coupled, perhaps, with some additional distrust on account of irritation growing out of our foreign relations, it is impossible, at the present time, to place these low-rate bonds in the hands of foreigners. They must be absorbed by our own people. The best evidence of our wealth as a nation and our financial strength at home, and the confidence of our own people that the Government will remain upon a gold basis, would be the successful placing of these long-time, low-rate bonds in the hands of our own people. This, in an important way, redounds to the benefit of the general public and is an unqualified indorsement of public credit. It would, it seems to me, go further than anything else, after the revision of our currency system, to vindicate our credit at home and reestablish it abroad.

An easy money market, with a uniform rate of interest, undisturbed by any stringency, however temporary, is indispensable to the successful accomplishment of these undertakings. The object in desiring an interview with you was to impress upon you these views, which, in the regular course of business, are kept constantly before us, but which, however, owing to the pressure of your official duties, may, perhaps, not have impressed themselves as strongly upon your mind.

The leading financial interests in this city are working earnestly and in unison to accomplish the above results, and, well knowing your predisposition to aid, within all proper limits, we wished to place before you the subject in the same light which we, through daily business contact with these matters, see it. Believe me,

Yours, sincerely,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

When the Secretary of the Treasury notified the National City Bank, April 7, 1898 (page 91 of the reply), that it would draw six drafts for $350,000, Union Pacific funds, upon the bank, Mr. A. B.

Hepburn wrote the following remarkable letter to Mr. Gage (page 91 of the reply):

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York, April 8, 1898.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your communication, and note that you have drawn six drafts on us for $350 each—

It should be $350,000, as shown in the subsequent correspondence—which will be presented on alternate days by the assistant secretary here. We prefer to have it withdrawn in this quiet way and are obliged to you for taking this method. We deem it important for the interests of the whole country that the New York banks, in their aggregate statement through the clearing house, which is made once a week and telegraphed all over the country, show up as strongly as possible in the point of reserve. In addition to the personal interests we naturally have in this matter, we think it militates largely in favor of commercial interests of the country as a whole. We very much hope you will see your way clear to leave the remainder of this Union Pacific deposit with us until July.

Very respectfully,

A. B. HEPBURN,
Vice-President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Hepburn wanted the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a conspiracy with him to give the country a false impression of the reserve in the national banks in New York.

Mr. SPOONER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. ALLEN. The letter of April 8, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER. On what page?

Mr. ALLEN. On page 91. There he invites the Secretary of the Treasury of this great Government of ours to give a false impression to the people of the country, to the country banks, to the farming and manufacturing interests of the country, that there was more money in reserve in the national banks in New York than was really there.

Mr. President, would you not suppose that ought to have called forth a rebuke from the Secretary of the Treasury? Ought he not to have rebuked this man for inviting him into a conspiracy of that kind? Yet this correspondence fails to disclose a rebuke for this invitation, even in the mildest form. On the other hand, I think it clearly appears from the letter of April 11 that the Secretary of the Treasury at least acquiesced in the proposition. That compliance with this demand was intended by Secretary Gage is confirmed by the following letter from him to the vice-president of the National City Bank (page 92 of the reply):

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 11, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which is expressed a wish that the remainder of the deposit on account of purchase of the Union Pacific Railroad be allowed to be held by the special depository banks in New York City until July, and to inform you that due notice will be given you as to time and amount of the proposed withdrawals should any be required before the time mentioned in your letter.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

VICE-PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York City.

There is a request to furnish the country with false information, and an acquiescence in that request. I do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury is so much to blame for that, for it seems to have been the practice for the last twenty-five or thirty years, if the reports from the Treasury Department are to be believed.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator to a misprint?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a misprint in one of the letters from which the Senator has read on page 91, the letter of Mr. Hepburn.

Mr. ALLEN. Of April 11?

Mr. ALLISON. No; of April 8, where there is a misprint. Instead of $350, as it there appears, the amount should be $350,000.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. I mentioned that it should be $350,000 when I read that letter.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. It is only a small omission of a part of the type.

Mr. President, the National City Bank was not satisfied with getting funds of the Union Pacific Railroad, some $58,000,000, and other funds, but as soon as we got into war with Spain and began to have peculiar commercial and military relations with the Philippine Islands, that moment this bank sought to get control of the money that was to be disbursed in the Philippine Islands.

I do not want, Mr. President, to refer to the unpleasant scene which took place here yesterday morning, and I shall not do so; but it is said that many of the greatest truths of science have been discovered by accident, and especially in the medical world, and to the Senator from South Dakota at least can be accredited the discovery of what may properly be called Senatorial rigor, as it ran around through Senatorial circles here yesterday morning. Here this bank is reaching out for funds which were to be distributed in the Philippine Islands, as shown by the correspondence of the Secretary about that matter. I read the letter of Mr. Stillman to the Secretary of the Treasury of June 2, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER. On what page is it found?

Mr. ALLEN. These two letters are found on pages 94, 95, and 96,

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, June 2, 1898.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I presume that the Government will have more or less financial business to transact with our new "colony."

It seems to me that as we are a national bank and have the very best connections in the Philippine Islands it would be proper for the Government to transact this business through us. Our correspondents are the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, with whom we are very intimate and who have done business with us for years. Mr. Townsend, their agent here, has resided many years in the East, and he informs me that he has already addressed you upon this subject, but realizes that as his corporation is a foreign one the business would naturally be done through an American bank.

I have outlined the matter in detail to Mr. Hepburn, and he will write you fully respecting same; and if you conclude that it is to the interests of the Government to transact this business through us, we should be pleased to serve you. What I would suggest would be that the Government simply have an account at this bank, and that the forwarding and receiving of money between this country and the Philippines would be attended to by us.

I am, yours, respectfully,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit a question at this point?

Mr. ALLEN. I certainly will.

Mr. CARTER. About the time the troops were to be forwarded to the island of Luzon I happened to be in the office of the Paymaster-General of the Army, and upon inquiry there found that the Paymaster-General was wholly without facilities of a banking character except through London for securing the payment of troops in the Philippine Islands. I should like to know if the Senator regards the effort of the Government, in the presence of that state of facts, as being improper in securing American banking connections whereby our soldiers and sailors serving in that distant country might be paid in American money through American banks without the ruinous discounts they were compelled to suffer in the island of Luzon because of the payment through London.

Mr. ALLEN. In the law of pleading that would be regarded as a departure, and I do not think it proper at this time——

Mr. SPOONER. Not a departure from the proof, but a departure from the Senator's speech.

Mr. ALLEN. A departure from the proof; and a departure in pleading is always fatal, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. CARTER. I make that statement of fact and ask the Senator's opinion of it.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not propose to have the Senator inject any little arrows in my speech.

Mr. SPOONER. I take it back.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not speaking of the Senator from Wisconsin. I am speaking of the Senator from Montana. I do not propose that he shall divert me from the course I think I ought to pursue. At another time, when it is germane to the discussion, I will be glad to answer the Senator fully. It is not germane to this discussion.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the Senator's criticism to be directed against the effort of the Government of the United States, and the banks organized under it, to perfect banking facilities for the transfer of money from New York and Washington to Luzon.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator excuse me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Let me answer the Senator from Montana. If the Senator understands that, he is in error, as he is in many other things. I have made no comment upon it thus far.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Nebraska, I will say to the Senator from Montana, is now endeavoring to show that an American bank was trying to get this business, not that the Secretary of the Treasury was giving it to it.

Mr. CARTER. That was the reprehensible action.

Mr. ALDRICH. That an American bank was suggesting reasons why it should be employed in this business.

Mr. CARTER. Rather than the banks of London?

Mr. ALDRICH. Rather than the banks of London.

Mr. CARTER. A very reprehensible action.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Nebraska desires to enter a denial to the conclusions of both Senators. He will be his own interpreter of what he wants to say.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.
New York, June 2, 1898.

DEAR SIR: It is becoming apparent that the business of the United States Treasury with the Philippine Islands in future must be very considerable, not alone to maintain the military and naval establishment, but the civil government about to be inaugurated. We respectfully apply for the position of fiscal agents, confident that we can afford you every facility in the conduct of your business upon the most favorable terms.

I may stop here long enough to direct attention to the fact that this was long after Mr. Hepburn had appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury to favor his bank with deposits on account of the contribution of its stockholder to the Republican campaign fund of 1896.

Now, along the line with his constant appeals for favoritism to his bank, not satisfied with the tremendous sum of money the Secretary of the Treasury had put in that bank and suffered them to use in their private business without a farthing of compensation to the Government, he appeals to his friend in the Treasury Department, on the score of the assistance given the Republican party in 1896, to give them this Philippine business.

Mr. ALDRICH. Where is that? Where does that part appear?

Mr. ALLEN. That is the conclusion the Senator from Nebraska comes to, and not the conclusion of the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not in the letters. It is a conclusion outside of the letters.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a logical deduction, exactly.

Mr. CARTER. Made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President; it is just as logical a deduction as it is to say that 2 and 2 make 4. You may undertake to bully this matter down if you want to. You may stand here to defend this man or these men and this bank if you want to. You may undertake to inject into the body of my remarks diverting questions, but I say to you gentlemen you will never be able to deceive the American people into the belief that there was not an undue intimacy between the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank of New York. I do not blame you for feeling sensitive about it whenever one of these letters is read. You can not laugh it down nor sneer it down. It stands there as part of the permanent records of the country. I know it hurts, too.

The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation does its New York business through us, and our relations with them are very close. They are, by consensus of opinion, the strongest and best equipped banking institution for the transaction of eastern business. I inclose their semiannual report. They have long been established at Manila and Iloilo and are doing the major part of the banking business at those points. The Chartered Bank of India, London, and China, and a branch of the Bank of Spain, I believe, are the only other banking institutions at Manila.

The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation have for many years represented the British Government in the East, making payments for the diplomatic, consular, naval, and military service, and rendering accounts therefor monthly, the amount of which, when approved, was placed to their credit in London.

We would be glad to open upon our books with you a Manila or colonial account, and will transmit funds to and from Manila or other eastern points without inconvenience to yourselves and upon most favorable terms. We can arrange for the cashing of drafts upon London, New York, or Washington, drawn by anyone whom you may designate. We are very anxious to make this connection, and will gladly go to Washington for a personal interview in case it should be desired.

Very truly, yours,

A. B. HEPBURN,
Vice-President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Why could not the Government of the United States itself, or the Secretary of the Treasury, make that arrangement instead of turning it over to this institution?

Mr. SPOONER. From what letter did the Senator from Nebraska read just now?

Mr. ALLEN. That is the letter of June 2, 1898.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Found on page 94.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the Hepburn letter?

Mr. ALLEN. That is one of the Hepburn letters. They are numerous.

Mr. SPOONER. It is one of them?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. The Hepburn letters are like the leaves of Vallombrosa.

This is the response of Mr. Vanderlip:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 8, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant and of one from Mr. Hepburn, vice-president, same date, both concerning the designation of your bank as a fiscal agent for the transaction of Government business relating to the Philippine Islands.

It is not understood that any special designation, as above mentioned, is necessary. United States disbursing officers of the Army and Navy stationed at the Philippine Islands may from time to time need letters of credit on London or elsewhere in order to obtain cash to make current disbursements, and upon receipt of notice from the Secretary of War or Navy that a letter of credit is needed this Department will endeavor to procure it at the best rate obtainable, payment therefor or of any portion of it to be made upon receipt by this office of the draft drawn by the United States disbursing officer against it.

Respectfully, yours,

F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary.

PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York, N. Y.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator find anything in that letter to criticise?

Mr. ALLEN. Can I find anything to criticise?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not find anything in it to criticise, but I find in it a very important fact, that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury himself realized that the request on the part of Hepburn or Stillman and Hepburn was an unusual request, and that the arrangement would be an unusual arrangement; that it was a request which ought not to be made, and that an arrangement of that kind ought not to be made. It is to the credit of Mr. Vanderlip that he put an end to the transaction there in that letter.

I will insert, without reading, the letter of Mr. Hepburn to Mr. Vanderlip of June 9, 1898. Senators will find it on the same page.

Mr. SPOONER. Page 96.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 9, 1898.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your letter of June 8, replying to communications from this bank with reference to its being designated as fiscal agent for the transaction of Government business in the far East. We note your comment that the United States disbursing officers of the Army and Navy may from time to time need letters of credit on London and elsewhere in order to obtain cash to make current disbursements, etc. We are prepared to issue such letters without limit as to the amount, and through our connection with the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, who have branches in the East, we can insure the cashing of such letters on most favorable terms.

We shall be very glad of the opportunity, foreshadowed in your letter, of competing for such letters of credit as the needs of the War and Navy Departments require the same. With many thanks for your courtesy, and assuring you of our anxiety to serve you at all times, we are,

Very respectfully, yours,

A. B. HEPBURN, President.

Hon. F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Treasurer, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, as tending to show that the reply of the Secretary to the resolution of January 4 was not full, I desire to read Mr. Stillman's letter to Mr. Gage of September 13, 1898. The famous Hepburn letter, to which much reference has been made in the press of the country, was dated June 5, 1897.

Mr. ALDRICH. On what page is it?

Mr. ALLEN. That is printed upon page 70, I think—possibly 60—of this report, and the letter of September 13, I think, occurs on page 102. There was a hiatus of almost four months between the two letters.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, September 13, 1898.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Acting upon Mr. Hepburn's report to me of the interview he had with you last Saturday—

I want to know what that interview was. In this last report the Secretary says that nothing took place, that there was no correspondence within that time, and he knows of no interview. Yet in that letter of September 13 Mr. Stillman calls attention to the fact of an interview between Mr. Hepburn and the Secretary of the Treasury between those dates.

I take pleasure in advising that we have secured $3,000,000 United States bonds and expect to obtain an additional amount, which we will lodge with the Treasury Department as security for Government deposits, which we trust you may be able to favor us with at an early date.

Assuring you of our earnest desire to afford you every possible assistance in your efforts to relieve the financial situation, I am,

Yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN, President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Washington, D. C.

That Mr. Gage had the undivided support of the great financiers of New York is shown by a letter written by Mr. Stillman to him, on page 105 of this document. This letter indicates that Mr. Stillman and the National City Bank officials were regarded as the official representatives of the Treasury Department in New York City. It is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, November 16, 1898.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I wish to congratulate you upon the beneficial result which has already been produced by the wise action which you have taken in offering to buy a sufficient amount of United States bonds to prevent any severe stringency in our money market.

Within the last few days there has been a growing feeling of uneasiness as it became more and more difficult to borrow money upon time. This uneasiness was caused in a large measure by an impression that has been somehow created that the present Administration would not relieve the money market in the above manner. Now that it is known what the policy of the Administration is, confidence has been restored and it is not material whether your offer is largely availed of or not.

The only adverse criticisms that I have heard have been on the part of the money lenders dealing in comparatively small amounts, who can see nothing beyond getting high rates of interest for themselves.

Among the prominent men whom I have met to-day approval is unstinted, and Messrs. Morgan & Co. especially have asked me to convey to you their appreciation of your action. Believe me,

Yours, respectfully,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

I suppose that refers to the kind-hearted action of the Secretary of the Treasury in going to the relief of the money market of New York a few months ago, and the opinion seems to have grown up not only in this Chamber——

Mr. ALLISON. This letter is dated 1898. It could not refer to that matter.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. There may be a mistake, however, in the date.

Mr. ALLEN. There may be a mistake in the date.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a subsequent letter of 1898.

Mr. ALLEN. The opinion seems to have grown up, until I think it is accepted without dissent on the other side of the Chamber, that every time the money market of New York is disturbed by the stock brokers and gamblers it is the duty of the Treasury of the United States to go to their relief. Whenever they see fit to precipitate a panic they call upon the Treasury of the United States for money to relieve them of the situation.

Does the Treasury Department go to the relief of any other class of people? Who are these men who precipitate these panics? They do not represent the substantial business interests of New York or other cities or other localities. They are properly denominated as the gamblers of Wall street and the financial centers of the country. Every time they undertake to precipitate a panic or disturbance for their own interest they call lustily to the Treasury Department to come to their assistance, and it would seem that Mr. Gage has gone to their relief in every instance. Would it not be more in consonance with the propriety of things for the industrial interests to be assisted some? There is not an instance in all the history of this country—not one under Republican rule or any other rule, for that matter—where the Treasury Department has gone to the assistance of the agricultural interests of the country. It always goes to the assistance of the banks, and by the use of Government money in large quantities the banks are able to make millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. President, after having secured the greater portion of the Union Pacific fund as a deposit, and as it was fast disappearing, the National City Bank learned of the payment soon to be made on account of the Central Pacific Railroad. Here, again, frequent telephonic communication was resorted to by Mr. Gage and Mr. Stillman. The correspondence regarding this transaction is as follows (page 115):

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, February 20, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: If you think it is expedient to leave any of the money to be paid by the Central Pacific Railroad to the Government on deposit with the banks, we respectfully apply for such deposits and tender you our services in the matter.

As you know, we are ready to furnish a large amount of United States Government bonds to secure any deposit which you may deem advisable for the Government to have with us.

I am, yours, respectfully, JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Gage said:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 25, 1899.

DEAR MR. STILLMAN: It is probable that by the 15th of March the Treasury Department will realize an advance payment of $13,000,000 or thereabouts on account of the Central Pacific Railway. If the Department acted without regard to any consideration except its own convenience it would require the payment to be made at the subtreasury at New York in one sum. This, however, might be a considerable contribution from the reserves in one day, and, in view of your suggestion that you would qualify to take any deposits on that account that the Department might see fit to make with you, I now write to inquire whether you would be disposed to put up the bonds required and accept the deposit with the understanding that it should be in quite frequent installments, covering, perhaps, a period of thirty days, all told, transferred by you to the subtreasury. If during the day, on receipt of this, you can find it convenient to call me up on the telephone, we can talk it over.

I note your letter of the 24th regarding gold certificates.

Very truly, yours, LYMAN J. GAGE.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President National City Bank, New York.

That letter stamps as inaccurate the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that there was no telephonic communication between these two persons.

The letter of the 24th of February, 1899, referred to by Mr. Gage, is absent from this correspondence.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is that?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Gage, in his letter of February 25, 1899, refers to a letter in this latter clause:

I note your letter of the 24th regarding gold certificates.

That letter is absent from the correspondence and does not even appear in the corrected report of the Secretary of the Treasury received here a day or two ago.

Although Mr. Gage in his letter to Mr. Stillman suggested that the money would remain about thirty days, after telephonic communication with Mr. Stillman the time limit was raised to sixty days, as is shown in the following letter (page 116):

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York, February 27, 1899.

SIR: Referring to your valued favor of the 25th instant and our conversation over the telephone this afternoon relative to the moneys to be received by the Treasury Department about the 15th of March on account of the Central Pacific Railway, I beg to confirm our understanding that you will place with us, say, $5,000,000 of this money, the same to remain with us for about sixty days, against which we are to deposit the necessary bonds with the assistant treasurer here.

Assuring you of our appreciation of your action in the matter, and of our readiness to serve you at all times,

I am, respectfully, yours, JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Stillman of February 27, 1899, indicates that the money deposited was to be covered into the subtreasury in installments of $1,000,000 at intervals of ten days each, and I shall ask to publish it without stopping to read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator ought to read what the Secretary said in reply to this letter.

Mr. ALLEN. It will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator will put the whole letter in?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; the whole letter.

Mr. ALDRICH. All right.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to have the Senator from Rhode Island think that I would intentionally leave out anything.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not make that suggestion.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Secretary has a defense, I am perfectly willing that it shall be made.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Rhode Island did not understand the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand what the Senator said.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 27th, written in pursuance of our conversation over the telephone relative to your qualifying for an increased deposit on account of payments to be made on account of the Central Pacific Railway. You say:

"I beg to confirm our understanding that you will place with us, say, $5,000,000 of this money, the same to remain with us for about sixty days."

It is best that we should have no misunderstanding. Any moneys deposited with you, or with any other depository, will always be subject to the immediate demand of the Government, although it may be fairly assumed that unexpected or unreasonable requisitions will not be made. I meant to have you understand over the telephone that, in the ordinary course of business, if you qualified to receive the sum of $5,000,000 out of the probable $12,000,000 that will be deposited about the 10th of March, it would meet the convenience and requirements of the Department if you transferred this sum to the subtreasury in installments during the next sixty days succeeding to the deposit, and if you take the deposit our probable orders will be to make transfer in sums of $1,000,000 each about ten days apart, which would carry the final transfer to sixty days hence.

Neither must it be inferred by you that this deposit, if made, will affect at all the balance now in your hands due to the Treasurer of the United States, as it is not unlikely that transfers may be ordered from time to time into the Treasury from depository banks now holding the sum of $80,000,000 of the public moneys. If such should be the case, requisitions will be made upon you against the balance you now have in hand, quite independent of the $5,000,000, which is the subject of our present correspondence.

Very truly, yours, LYMAN J. GAGE.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President The National City Bank, New York City.

Mr. ALLEN. After one deposit, as instructed, in the National City Bank, Mr. Stillman wrote Secretary Gage complaining about the money market. In this letter it was admitted that the bank in using money had to "force a liquidation in highly speculative stocks," an admission to Secretary Gage that he was using Government funds to "rig" the stock market; and in order that he might continue he asked for permission to defer the $1,000,000 payments on the Central Pacific for one week each. Despite his own statement that he had been successful in causing a decline in stocks, Mr. Stillman requested the Secretary of the Treasury for more time to make his own payments. The letter is a most remarkable one, and should have called forth a rebuke from Mr. Gage, but the correspondence fails to show that one was sent him. It is in the following language——

Mr. SPOONER. On what page?

Mr. ALLEN. On page 118. It is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, April 8, 1899.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: As you have doubtless noticed in the press, the money market here has been quite unsettled during the latter part of the week. We have loaned very liberally in order to allay apprehension, but at such rates as would tend to force a liquidation in highly speculative securities. I think this has been accomplished, and the declines which have taken place will have a wholesome check.

Now, Mr. President, there is an open confession upon the part of the president of this bank that the money of the United States deposited there was used by the bank for the purpose of raising the rate of interest and causing a liquidation in the stock market. Instead of allaying the panic, it was used for the purpose of precipitating a panic and a liquidation of what Mr. Stillman sees fit to call "highly speculative securities." The money of the people of the United States, of the taxpayers of the country all over this country, was put by the Secretary of the Treasury in the hands of a political friend, or the bank of a political friend, to be used by that bank to control the markets of the city of New York, and incidentally the markets of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. That letter was brief. Will the Senator read it once more? I did not catch it.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not yet read it all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. Will the Senator read it, commencing at the beginning?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly. The letter is as follows:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you have doubtless noticed in the press, the money market here has been quite unsettled during the latter part of the week. We have loaned very liberally in order to allay apprehension, but at such rates as would tend to force a liquidation in highly speculative securities. I think this has been accomplished, and the declines which have taken place will have a wholesome check.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That should be "effect," I think, should it not?

Mr. ALLEN. It would mean either. It might read "wholesome effect," probably, but it says "check"—c-h-e-c-k.

This uneasy feeling, however, will probably not subside for some few days yet, and as there are several large payments to be made next week, notably some $8,000,000 on Monday, the 10th, on the Chicago and Alton business, I think it would tend to help matters if you can see your way to deferring the payments which we are to make on account of Central Pacific moneys for one week each. I trust this will meet with your approval and that you will advise me either to-morrow or on Monday morning by wire of your decision in the matter.

I inclose the weekly statement of the associated banks of this city. Our own position to-night are call loans on Wall street of $55,101,000 and cash in our vaults $31,698,000.

I am, yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Washington, D. C.

The reply of Secretary Gage to the request of Mr. Stillman to be notified of his decision in the matter by telegraph does not appear in the record, but Assistant Treasurer Jordan sent the following letter to Secretary Gage regarding the matter (page 120 of the reply):

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New York, N. Y., April 10, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a telegram from you postponing the payment of installment of $1,000,000, due to-day on account of Central Pacific deposit, was this day exhibited to me by Mr. Whitson, cashier of the National City Bank. I am without direction from your office on the subject.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

This indicates that Secretary Gage ignored Mr. Jordan, to whom the payments should have been made, but did notify the bank. The telegram addressed to Mr. Whitson does not appear in the correspondence.

I call attention in this connection to the following letter of Mr. Stillman (page 120 of the reply):

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, April 10, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of this date, in reply to my letter of the 8th instant to the Secretary, reading: "Postpone transfers until further advice."

My object in writing the Secretary was simply to postpone any unnecessary drains upon our money market while it was in such a sensitive condition.

The tone of the market has been much better to-day, and I thank you and the Secretary for the consideration which you have given the suggestion contained in my letter of Saturday.

I am, yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

Hon. F. A. VANDERLIP,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

And the following letter of Mr. Stillman in reply:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1899.

SIR: You are hereby instructed to deposit with the assistant treasurer of the United States in your city, as a "transfer of funds," the sum of $500,000 on Friday, 14th instant, and continue to deposit a similar amount from funds to credit of the Treasurer of the United States each Thursday thereafter until further advised.

The assistant treasurer will be authorized to allow you to withdraw a corresponding amount of security bonds upon receipt of each deposit on account of "transfer of funds," and Department instructions to your bank, dated March 2, 1899, concerning transfers of $1,000,000 at intervals of ten days, are hereby revoked.

Respectfully, yours,

F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary.

The PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York City.

The $1,000,000 payments, which were to have been made every ten days, was on April 12, 1899, reduced to payments of $500,000.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To be made weekly?

Mr. ALDRICH. Weekly.

Mr. ALLEN. Weekly payments, and on July 6, 1899 (page 122 of the reply), the transfer of these sums was ordered discontinued.

The National City Bank's success in obtaining favors from the Treasury Department emboldened them to ask for the post-office funds in New York City. In this they met one of their first defeats. First Assistant Postmaster-General Heath, a heavy stockholder in the Seventh National of New York, as is said, was instrumental in bringing about this defeat. Mr. Stillman requested Mr. Gage (page 124 of the reply), in a letter of December 19, 1899, for this deposit:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, December 19, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: If, in view of recent events, it be found expedient to make a change in the depository of the post-office funds, or that of any of the other Government departments in this city, I would be pleased to have this bank considered in regard to receiving one of the accounts, and would very greatly appreciate anything that you may be able to do in our behalf.

Thanking you in advance for your kind offices, I am,

Yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Washington, D. C.

I beg to offer my congratulations on the result of your increasing the Government deposits in the national banks.

J. S.

Mr. President, this congratulation is important as showing the relation existing between these two gentlemen and between the National City Bank and the Treasury Department of the United States.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] was appealed to by the National City Bank to assist them in securing the post-office funds, and he wrote Mr. Gage the following letter on December 22, 1899 (page 127 of the reply):

NEW YORK, December 22, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Kindly read attached letter from Mr. James Stillman, the president of the National City Bank, which is self-explanatory. It is unnecessary for me to say that it would be very gratifying to me if his wishes could be respected. You know, without my mentioning it, how reliable and important a banking institution the National City Bank is. I will be pleased to hear from you at your convenience regarding the matter.

Yours, truly,

T. C. PLATT.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

And here is Mr. Gage's reply (page 127 of the record):

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 27, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d instant, inclosing a communication from Mr. Stillman, president of the National City Bank of New York, indicating a wish to have the post-office account changed from the Seventh National Bank to the National City Bank, and to inform you that this Department does not feel at liberty to make the change requested for reasons set forth in letter addressed to the bank this day, copy of which is inclosed for your information.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. T. C. PLATT,
United States Senate.

This was President Stillman's request to Mr. PLATT (page 127 of the reply):

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, December 19, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: I trust you will pardon me for trespassing upon your valuable time, but if, in view of recent events, it be found expedient to make a change in the depository of the post-office funds, or that of any of the other Government departments in this city—

I do not know what recent events had transpired—

I would be pleased to have this bank considered in regard to receiving one of the accounts, and would very greatly appreciate anything that you may be able to do in our behalf.

Thanking you in advance for your kind offices, I am,

Yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. THOMAS C. PLATT, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Gage's response to Mr. Stillman is as follows (page 127 of the record):

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 27, 1899.

SIR: Referring to your recent request to have the National City Bank made a depository for post-office funds, I have to inform you that postal funds are by law under the control of the Postmaster-General, and it was only at his special request, made under authority conferred upon him by section 4046, Revised Statutes of the United States, that the Seventh National Bank of New York was specially designated for money-order funds. The funds are deposited to the official credit of the postmaster at New York, and by him checked out and transferred to the subtreasury to the credit of the Postmaster-General or his Department. The account is in the nature of a disbursing account, which could not, under section 3620, Revised Statutes, be kept with a bank in the same city with an assistant treasurer except upon the request of the Postmaster-General, under the special provisions of section 4046, relating to money-order funds, and this Department does not, therefore, feel at liberty to make the change requested.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK,
New York City.

Mr. Gage, in making the announcement of his intention to deposit internal-revenue receipts with the National City Bank and other banks, states that only banks having the bonds in their possession would be accepted as depositaries for this fund. President Stillman wrote the following letter to Secretary Gage (page 126 of the reply), showing that his bank had purchased the bonds at considerable expense, and asking that deposits be made quickly in order that they might get even:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
New York, December 21, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received this morning from the Treasurer of the United States a letter advising me that the various depositories of the internal-revenue receipts throughout the country have been instructed to remit here, and that we will be called upon to distribute these receipts pro rata among the various banks who qualify as depositories.

It will give us a great deal of pleasure to act in this capacity, but I feel, inasmuch as we deposited immediately with the assistant treasurer here upward of $5,000,000 in bonds, all of which were secured by us at a considerable expense, and that we the same day placed in the market a large amount of money in anticipation of receiving at once reimbursements from the United States Government, that the pro rata distribution which the Treasurer refers to would work a material hardship upon us. I therefore hope that before we are required to divert the receipts to any extent we may be allowed to accumulate a sufficient amount to cover the bonds which we have deposited.

Very respectfully, yours,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Washington, D. C

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nebraska suspend for one moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to consult the convenience of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to proceed at present until my remarks are concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily until the Senator from Nebraska concludes his remarks.

Mr. DANIEL rose.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I have other engagements and would like to speak to-day on the bill which is the regular order at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. DANIEL. I dislike to interrupt the speech of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall endeavor to conclude this matter at some time. I was right in the midst of a letter and had nearly finished the reading, but I will let it go at that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The letter which the Senator was reading might be finished.

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Nebraska can resume his speech to-morrow after the routine morning business.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator from Virginia proceeds, I desire simply to observe that at some other time, when I will not be in the road of anyone, I shall endeavor to conclude my remarks. I was pretty nearly through when the morning hour expired. I have some other matter in the way of an analysis of these reports of the Secretary of the Treasury that I desire to place before the Senate and particularly before the country, so as to point out the glaring inconsistencies of a connection between the Treasury Department and the financial institutions of this country. I regret that I got in the road of the Senator from Virginia and could not conclude my remarks to-day.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN] be appointed to the committees upon which his name already appears. He was assigned to various committees while he was only a Senator by the appointment of the governor, but he has since been elected by the legislature and has taken his seat, and it may be best to have his appointment made by the Senate to the same committees to which he was assigned before his credentials were presented and he was sworn in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Missouri as to the appointment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN] on committees? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the American people, by tradition and interest, have always favored bimetallism. The Democratic party have been its most pronounced and persistent advocates. They favor sound money. They demand the soundest money that the world has ever known or can know. They insist that it should consist of gold and silver and of paper redeemable in gold and silver at the option of the payor. They maintain that the units of the whole mass should be kept at parity by coinage rights and by equal legal-tender functions. This is the only method by which the parity of the two metals has ever been continuously, approximately, or perfectly maintained.

We should not forget, Mr. President, in approaching the consideration of our present financial condition that all of our currency is now at par. For over one hundred years the silver dollar has maintained itself as perfect money. To-day, in itself victorious over all its traducers and all its enemies, it still lifts its head up at par triumphant.

Never yet has a silver dollar of the United States depended upon anything but itself for its value. Self-supporting and self-reliant, it has worked its own way, and worked out, up to date, its own salvation.

Never yet has any silver dollar been "redeemed" at the Treasury of the United States by or in any other kind of dollar. Never has any statute of the United States provided for its redemption. Never has a Secretary of the Treasury transcended the law to redeem one. The dollar, whether of silver or gold, is not in its nature a thing to be redeemed. It is in itself a redeemer. Redemption in finance implies promise. The standard specie dollar is not a promise. There is nothing in it to which the attribute of redemption may be fitly applied. It is the standard and medium by which other things, such as taxes, obligations, notes, and other debts and liabilities, are redeemed.

As soon as the necessity of redemption in some other thing is imparted to an article, its value depends upon the promise of the redeemer. It becomes credit. The value of the silver dollar up to date has never depended on any redeemer's promise. It is cash.

I have in my possession a standard silver dollar of the issue of 1798. For nearly one hundred and two years it has been its own passport, and has been as good as any hundred cents that were ever known. Of the like dollars we have now $476,201,341, and they are all as good as this hoary and faithful servant of the people.

The leading thought in the Democratic campaign of 1896 was this, namely, that the volume of money in a country regulated the price of property and products, and the more money there was the higher the tendency of price. Events have vindicated the truth of this economic maxim. It is a general truth. It is a part of the universally accepted doctrine that supply and demand regulate prices. To understand it, we must regard it in its double aspect—as affecting money, in which price is stated, and as affecting property or product, which price is stated for.

If there be much money and much of a given article on the market, prices will be low, for the demand for money will be readily satisfied, as much of it will be seeking investment; and the demand for the article will be easily satisfied, as many of the kind will be seeking sale.

If there be much money and but few of the articles which it demands, there will be keen monetary competition for those articles and the price will be high.

If there be many of the articles demanded in the market and little money, the price will be low, for the articles will vie with each other in seeking chance for sale.

When we speak of the law of demand and supply we mean two things: First, the demand for money made by property and commodity for sale and its supply to meet that demand, and, second, the demand for property and commodity made by money and the supply thereof to meet it.

Money is the meeting place of the demand for and supply of commodities, and commodity is the meeting place of the demand for and supply of money. At this time there is more money in this country per capita than has been for many years, and a per capita of over $25 per head; and after an interruption of several years in manufacturing and the exhaustion of supplies on hand, it is but natural, and according to the eternal truth of the Democratic creed, that with more money and less commodities in the market prices should rise, and that active conditions in industry should exist.

I will exhibit here a table from the report of the Director of the Mint which I find on page 40. In that table it will appear that in the year 1893 there was $18.13 per capita in the United States. It will further appear that there was $3 more in 1899, or $21.04, while in the recent abstracts of the Treasury Department, which I beg leave to incorporate as an exhibit in my remarks, it will be seen that there is now over $25 per capita, or $7 more per head now than there was in 1893.

The increase in the stock of our money has arisen from the unprecedented increase in the production of gold. When the Sherman law was repealed, on November 1, 1893, and not an ounce of silver could thereafter enter the Treasury to be coined, and when all the world was suffering from stringent conditions produced by the like disfranchisement of silver in other great nations, there was a sudden and almost universal rush for the gold fields wherever they could be found.

British ships laden with mining machinery were soon bounding over the waves for South Africa and Australia, and American ships, on a similar mission, were off for Alaska. Gold mines hitherto yielding unproductive returns became profitable under the appreciation of and urgent demand for gold.

New mines were found. Hungry hordes hastened wherever the yellow metal could be hoped for; gold companies were organized in all capitalistic centers; the energies of the world were concentered on the finding and the mining of the one thing needful—gold. It was found, it was mined, it was minted, it flowed into the channels of trade; and with more money in circulation commerce and manufacture moved.

Thus ever does our good mother nature try to heal or compensate for wounds made by accident or by the folly of man. Put out one eye and the sight of the other is quickened. Put out both eyes and hearing and touch are quickened. Destroy one source of monetary supply, and demand thrown solely upon the other increases its production.

There are certain tendencies, Mr. President, which mark and permeate the movements of the existing nations of the earth. First, the tendency to consolidation of peoples, industries, and interests. Second, the tendency to greater armaments on land and sea. Third, the tendency to increased public expenditures. Fourth, the tendency to the increase of public indebtedness. Fifth, the tendency to decrease the basis standard or medium of payment.

Continental railroads and world-wide steamboat lines, department stores, corporations, and trusts of all kinds are absorbing unto themselves the business heretofore diffused amongst the people. One head man, a directory, and a mass of employees take the place of independent communities with their diversified individual pursuits and enterprises. The greater nations are swallowing up and annexing the smaller ones. The village blacksmith and shoemaker and grocer give way to the mighty company, and the little republic to the mighty empire. Great navies are building and great armies are perpetually marshaling. The world speaks in a whisper lest disturbance come to it. Other people's money is easy to spend. Powerful governments can make great levies and appropriations. A massive capital, gathered into the public treasury, can do quickly what it will. So the budget increases, and away the money goes.

Then come two tendencies which start from one common standpoint, like the letter "V," and move outwardly, separating the interests of the taxpayer and security holder and making them wider and wider apart. These are a tendency to increase public indebtedness and public taxes and a tendency to abridge at the same time the basis of payment. It is obvious the more debts increase and the means of payment decrease, the gulf between the people who are the payers and the fortunate ones who are the payees must ever widen. Then classes in society must be created, the mass becoming poorer and more dependent and the few becoming richer. Disaster and collapse portend unless these tendencies can be arrested; and it is the duty of the wise man and the true citizen to forecast the future and to provide against an evil day.

There is a vicious circle; states fear to employ silver because of its depreciation, and the depreciation continues because states refuse to employ it.

We realize to-day the truth of this declaration of the Right Hon. George J. Goschen, the eminent financier, who was a British delegate to the monetary conference of 1878. But if there be a vicious circle, there is also a righteous one. The natural timidity of capital and its equally natural thirst to aggrandize itself alike prompt its perpetual war upon silver as a monetary metal.

On the other hand, the needs of society and the interests of the great masses of the working people of the world with equal pertinacity continue to support and to hang on to the use of silver. And so the strife goes on, with its ups and downs, with varying fortunes, the gold side predominating when times are good and the silver side blazing forth with aggressive and energetic action whenever and wherever the pinch of hard times or the flurry of panic comes.

The question between gold and silver, Mr. President, should be lifted above transient conditions of commerce and manufacture. It is a world-wide and perpetual question; and however often it may be put down, it will rise again. Whatsoever community abandons it will see its projected and persistent attempt to return; but many are like the old man who would not stop the crevice in the roof of his cabin when the sun shone because then it did not bother him, and who could not do it when the storm was beating and the water leaking into his home.

The masses of the people occupied in their own pursuits are naturally careless of legal conditions when they are prosperous; they believe in letting well enough alone, and when adversity comes they are helpless. It is only by sound principles generalized not from momentary conditions, but from the great truths of human history and philosophy, which teach by experience and by example that the builders of states and leaders of opinion can wisely set their compass. Through the sunshine and the storm, though we may not notice it, there is a constant play of universal law, and one day or another day its effect will be felt by those who scorn or do not know how to observe it.

It is not to be denied, Mr. President, and I do not deny, that this country is to-day prosperous in many lines of industrial pursuits. I congratulate its people upon this fact. I hope that that prosperity may continue, I hope it may increase, and I hope that every foreboding of evil which may exist in the heart of any man may be overcome by the continued prosperity of this people.

The railroads of recent years have been burdened down with their enormous freightage, the manufacturers are overcrowded with orders, over a million dollars' worth of manufactured goods are exported every day of the calendar year to other lands, merchants have had a lively business, the banks have been able for the most part to accommodate their customers, though now and then a sort of nervous shudder runs through them, and a stimulant from the Treasury in the way of deposits is loudly called for and promptly applied.

Our exports have increased with unprecedented rapidity and in unprecedented volume, so that we are now nearly abreast with Great Britain in their aggregate amount. Our National Treasury overflows with money; our armies and navies in two continents have sustained the traditional honor of American arms and added to their glory by brilliant achievements. Above all, Mr. President, the American people have all stood together in battle; something of the old-fashioned fraternity has come again with genial feeling and a public sentiment—to which the President of the United States has no little contributed—has been engendered, which can but fill the hearts of all with a generous glow of patriotism.

There are shadows to this picture. I shall not pause to notice them at this juncture. There are dangers ahead, which we can not as a wise people forego to notice, and one of the great dangers which, as I humbly conceive, is now threatening us, is the passage of this pending bill. The entrance of this bill into the legislative halls was not graceful, nor has its conduct here been reassuring. On the first day of the session of this Congress, December 4, 1899, it was introduced into the House of Representatives as a bill (H. R. No. 1) "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes."

On December 13 the debate commenced; on December 18 the bill passed. Its history was abnormal, and, for a financial measure, without precedent. No special committee prepared it; to none was it referred, and none reviewed it. On December 19 it came to the Senate. Here its history was equally remarkable. It did not spend a single quiet day of undisputed and unmutilated life in this body, for on the same day of its appearance the Finance Committee of the Senate welcomed it "with bloody hands to a hospitable grave."

They reported it back with a substitute amendment, which erased every line of its text and wiped it out of existence, save as a rejected proposition. The substitute is the proposition now pending. It is entitled "A bill to affirm the existing standard of value, to maintain the parity in value of all forms of money, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes."

Who originated this bill no one knows, or at least there is no publicity to its author's name; but whomsoever he may be, he is a cunning draftsman. He glides us into the gold standard with a smooth and easy process, and under the assurance that we have it now and have had it for many years. He has no doubt of that fact; no doubt at all in his own mind; he regards it as a self-evident fact; but he thinks we should renew the declaration and reaffirm the gold standard because the wicked Democrats dispute it. Why not appeal to the courts? They are the settlers of differences of opinion. That thought does not seem to the author of this bill to have been noticed. But the courts are open, and if we are upon the gold standard, they would know it and say so. They have said otherwise, as I shall show.

I take issue with the first section of the bill as unfounded in its statement of facts and unjustified as a public declaration. Let me read that section of the bill:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

If this bill intends to make private debts also payable hereafter in gold; if it intends to impart the presumption to every contract, verbal or written, that it must be paid according to the established standard, as alleged in this bill—I do not say that it says so—that question should be settled; and I call the attention of the sponsors of the bill to its existence. Section 3511 of the Revised Statutes, referred to in the first section of the bill, is in part as follows:

SEC. 3511. The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value; a quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece; a three-dollar piece; a half eagle, or five-dollar piece; an eagle or ten-dollar piece, and a double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece, etc.

This language of section 3511 of the Revised Statutes is taken from section 14 of the act of February 12, 1873, revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, etc.

It is asserted in the first section of this bill that the gold dollar piece, made the unit of value by that clause, is now our standard unit or standard of value. I deny this proposition. The United States is not upon the gold standard, but upon the double standard of imperfect and humpbacked bimetallism. That this is not a single gold standard country may be proved in many ways. First, by the clear and specific language of our statute; second, by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court; third, by the acts and declarations of the Presidents and executive officers of the country; fourth, by the declarations of Congress; fifth, by the declarations of the political conventions of all parties; and sixth, by the self-evident fact.

I wish, Mr. President, to place on record a refutation of the statement of fact and of the legal conclusion of the authors of this bill. I do not believe there is a respectable lawyer or judge in the United States who would advise this Government, or advise any client, that we are now upon the single gold standard; and if he did so, he would have to do so in the teeth of all the official agencies of this Government, of the statutes of the United States, and of the habitual practice of the Government and of the people.

Let it be observed, Mr. President, that by the act of February 12, 1873, the gold one-dollar piece, the actual physical one-dollar gold coin, was made the unit of value. Now, let anyone turn to the act of September 26, 1890, entitled "An act to discontinue the coinage of the three-dollar and one-dollar gold pieces and three-cent nickel piece," and he will find, first, an implied and then a direct repeal of the gold-dollar piece as a unit of value; and not only such repeal, but the discontinuance of the coinage of the unit and provision made for the withdrawal of all such gold dollars and units from circulation and their coinage into other denominations. Here is the act. Let it speak for itself:

Act of September 26, 1890. To discontinue the coinage of the three-dollar and one-dollar gold pieces and three-cent nickel piece.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act the coinage of the three-dollar gold piece, the one-dollar gold piece, and the three-cent nickel piece be, and the same is hereby, prohibited, and the pieces named shall not be struck or issued by the Mint of the United States.

SEC. 2. That as fast as the said coins shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States they shall be withdrawn from circulation and be recoined into other denominations of coins.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Here is, first, the prohibition of the gold unit; second, the provision for its recoinage; and, third, the repeal of all laws and parts of laws conflicting with its utter obliteration from our statutes. So, then, when the pending bill affects to continue that unit of value, it is obsolete, discontinued, discoined, rejected, repealed, prohibited, nonexistent, to wit, the gold dollar piece as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes. It misuses language; it puts a false color on the face of this bill; and it utterly ignores the disestablishment of that unit by express enactment. There are few or no gold dollar pieces to be found in circulation to-day, and such as exist, few in number, are curiosities, bangles, and jewels, held as precious relics of a bygone day, and of fictitious value.

I hold in my hand a list of prices from a collector of coins in New York, which is used by the Treasury of the United States, and which was kindly loaned me by the Director of the Mint. Following the clear and specific language of this section 1, we will see what is the value of our unit of value which it pretends to continue. If that unit of value was issued from 1849 to 1854, inclusive, it is worth $1.20; if from 1854 to 1862, inclusive, it is worth $1.25; if in 1863, from $3 to $5; if in 1864, from $3.50 to $5.50; if in 1865, $3.50 to $3.50; if in 1875, the gold dollar piece was worth $8 to $12.50, and if coined from 1880 to 1889, inclusive, it is worth $1.25.

Where upon this scale of the units of value does this bill play? It says the unit of value as established in a law that has been repealed; it affects to continue a thing which is dead, dead, dead. This country can go upon the gold standard if it wants to, but it is not necessary for us to creep into the gold standard by a false pretense.

In point of fact, Mr. President, the gold dollar piece long since ceased to be the unit of value before the act of September 26, 1890, which provided for its extermination and burial in other denominations, was passed. It lived as a unit of value for but a brief period, and perished before the resumption of specie payments, which occurred by law on the 1st of January, 1879.

Before that time the people of this country had become apprised of the situation. They had heard of the adoption of the gold unit of value in contemplation of the resumption of specie payments, and had also heard how the standard silver dollar had been slipped out from the coinage system and how the trade dollar had been slipped in, all these things being done by the act of February 12, 1873, which went still further and degraded silver to a subsidiary coinage and as a legal tender for no amount exceeding $5.

They made haste to correct this wrong and to avert the projected calamity; and on February 28, 1878, Congress enacted the Bland-Allison law, as it is commonly termed, which restored the old-time standard silver dollar of 412½ grains troy to our coinage system, made provision for the coinage of not less than two millions of such standard silver dollars per month, and declared that this dollar, together with all silver dollars theretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, should be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise stipulated in the contract.

These words contain the only condition upon which any obligation of Government or individual has been entered into since February 28, 1878, that were not upon the double standard of gold and silver payments. All the transactions of the United States, of the States, of the cities, of the counties, of the corporations, and of all the people of our country that did not stipulate in terms for their solution in gold have since then been on a bimetallic basis of gold and silver, or, to speak with more perfect accuracy, on the basis of solution in gold coin, silver coin, or in legal-tender paper money.

But more than this, the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee who reported this bill, and who insists so strenuously in his speech that we have been on the gold standard since the adoption of the gold-dollar unit in 1873, has himself been a party to the adoption and continuance of the double standard and to the introduction into our coinage of many hundred millions of standard silver dollars as a part of that double standard, and on the most memorable financial act of the last decade the political organization of which he and a majority of this body are now members placed themselves upon record and plumed themselves upon this achievement in behalf of the double standard.

On the 14th day of July, 1890, not ninety days before the gold dollar, the unit piece, was formally dispatched and disposed of, Congress passed the Sherman law, directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes. This act, which was approved by President Harrison, made compulsory the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month and the issue of Treasury notes therefor, at a price not exceeding $1 for every 371¼ grains of pure silver, the notes to be payable, just as our bonds are payable, in coin—the very expression of the double standard—and to make the expression full and perfect it was provided in addition:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin at his discretion.

It was further provided—

That the Treasury notes issued should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

Thus the Republican party clothed silver with high dignity, provided for its standard character, and made the notes based on it legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

Thus did it embed silver under our national banking system and in our tariff system and in our internal-revenue system and in our legislative system, and make it count everywhere and in all things just the same as gold, excepting only "where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract." Speedily after this act was passed, and in accordance with its purview, and within ninety days, did Congress formally discontinue the coinage and provide for the destruction of the gold-dollar unit in order that silver-dollar units might take their place as a more fitting currency for such sum.

I shall not at this place pause to enlarge upon the ill philosophy which underlay this ill-omened offspring of Republican legislation called the Sherman law, or to advert to the effort made by the Democrats in this body to save the country from the disappointments, the malpractices, and the ill consequences which they believed it would bring upon us. Its chief advocate, the Hon. John Sherman, declared, in his Memoirs, that on the very next day he would have voted to repeal it. The Democrats did better; they voted against it for the most part.

For myself, I felt then that it was founded on false principles; that it would not restore silver; that it would be a wellspring of evil; and I predicted that in two or three years a day of judgment would come and sit upon it. Three years later that day of judgment came, and the authors of this misshapen measure were its most pronounced and bitter enemies. The "makeshift" had strutted and fretted "its hour upon the stage" and then was "heard no more."

Taking advantage of the hue and cry that they had helped to raise against themselves, the architects of ruin joined hands with the Cleveland Administration to undo their own work. But in the very act of its undoing they renewed allegiance to the double standard, renewed the faithless vows that they were breaking, and betrayed silver with a kiss.

They repealed the Sherman law without the substitute. Plenty of time for a substitute to-morrow, they said, or the day after, but neither to-morrow nor the day after ever came. But here in their repealing statute they declared their convictions and made their pledges to the American people, and I read what was said:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver.

How, Mr. President?—

to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts.

I have here the names and produce the names of those who voted for and against this measure. Lo, the name of my honorable friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, leads all the rest.

Vote on the repeal of the Sherman law October 30, 1893.

Here, Mr. President, is the last legislative act of great importance affecting our coinage—the fourth act which I have cited which disestablishes the gold piece as unit of value; the fourth act that refutes the pretension of this bill that we are now upon the gold standard.

It recognizes that the gold unit had been displaced previous to its passage, and—mark its phraseology—it does not promise to bring about, but to "continue the use of both gold and silver"—in what character? "As standard money." "Continue," that is the word. And it pledges this Government solemnly to direct its efforts steadily to such safe system of bimetallism as will maintain the equality of the coins. How do these allegations affect and how do these promises of performance consist with the pending bill?

How do these sentences, "Continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money," made in 1893, and "Continue the dollar consisting of 25.8 of gold nine-tenths fine to be the standard unit of value," agree with each other? And would any man believe that one man or one set of men could be the authors of or sponsors for both sentences? And yet, Mr. President, they who made the one declaration are now undertaking to make the other.

The nice and specific particularity with which the Republican party is impeaching itself and its legislative record is a picture that no language of mine could fitly describe; and I shall simply leave the picture for such contemplations and reflections as it may fitly inspire.

But these are not the only statutes which recognize the existence of the double standard of gold and silver. Our borrowing acts and our paying acts, as well as our coinage and currency acts since 1873, are all of one import. First comes the act to strengthen the public credit, of March 18, 1869, providing that our notes and interest-bearing obligations alike be payable "in coin or its equivalent, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver." So both in its declaration and its exception it points to gold or silver as the medium of payment.

Next comes the act to provide for the resumption of specie payments, to begin on the 1st of January, 1879. Its very title indicates its nature. It was to "resume" or return to something that had been suspended. What was that? Gold payments? Never! "Specie payments"—that was what was to be resumed, and "specie" was no more nor less than the gold and silver of the Constitution.

Look in the body of the act and there are no less than four provisions that show gold and silver to be the standard of payment, and not gold alone. We have (1) the provision for coining minor silver coins to redeem fractional currency. Then (2) the express declaration for the redemption, on and after January 1, 1879, of the Treasury notes "in coin," not in "gold," not in "silver" coin, but "in coin," whether of gold or silver. Then (3) the provision for the use of any "surplus moneys" by the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the redemption of the greenbacks, not gold surplus, not silver surplus, but any surplus; and (4) the provision for the issue of bonds to provide for the redemption. What kind of bonds? Gold bonds? No. Silver bonds? No, but coin bonds.

Next came the resolutions passed on the 25th of January, 1878, by a vote of 43 to 32 in the Senate, and by the House of Representatives January 29 by a vote of 189 yeas to 79 nays, just fifteen days before the Bland-Allison Act, which resolution was offered in this body by Hon. Stanley Matthews, afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court. The recital of this preamble tells the history of the various acts that preceded it, and the declaration of the double standard of our obligations responded to the sentiment and to the vote of Congress and the sentiment of the country.

There were many eminent and respectable names among those who voted for this resolution, among them Judge Matthews himself, afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court; Judge Davis, of Illinois, who had been a judge of the Supreme Court; Mr. Windom, who became Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Carlisle, who became Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Burchard, who became Director of the Mint; Mr. CANNON, and General Cox, of Ohio, and Mr. Keifer, of Ohio, and Kelley, of Pennsylvania, and Sunset Cox and Durham, Ewing, Turner, Sayler, Sparks, Springer, and Tucker.

The most eminent men in the public life of this country sustained that legal proposition, but it is now contended that we are upon the single unit of gold.

Before I leave this branch of the subject, let me say that if we look beyond law to equity, all the equity is in favor of silver as a medium of payment equal to gold; bond creditors should indeed be glad to get silver, for it is true, as I showed in 1893, giving the official letter from Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury in 1878, to Vice-President Wheeler, then President of this body, the total amount received into the Treasury up to that time, viz, April 22, 1878, for the bonds of the United States was $4,448,334,810.27, and the total amount of coin in this sum was only $979,627,987.72—less than 25 per cent in coin.

The currency paid for the bonds was worth about 60 cents on the dollar; and when the creditor side makes 40 per cent by being paid in coin it is pretty hard to see that it has any equity that calls for any larger payment.

We have it upon the authority of a leading Republican who has recently published a statement that the great London banker, Mr. Rothschild, when these measures were pending years ago as to the issue of bonds, said:

I would rather have them payable in coin, for, at the rate gold is being produced now, and in anticipation of the enlarged production in the near future, it is not impossible that silver may be the better money when the bonds mature.

It was therefore not only consistent with the clear meaning of the language, but consistent with the natural projections of finance, to take the chances between silver and gold, and having taken the chances, the chance on the part of those who made the contract should be legally abided by.

But I turn to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. There are a number of them. I need give but one, the case of Bank vs. Supervisors (7 Wallace, 29). Said the Chief Justice, delivering the opinion:

Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the United States, a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government.

The acts and declarations of our highest administrative officers are in line with the statutes and the decisions of the court. Not that they have been consistent. They have not been so. Many of them have been calculated to mislead and to deceive.

We can understand the man who says that it is, in his opinion, wise and expedient that we shall adopt the gold standard. I do not understand him who contends that we are upon it, except that he is indulging himself in what I shall term here a fanciful expression.

In February, 1895, the Cleveland Administration sold to certain bankers $62,315,435 bonds, payable "in coin," and President Cleveland, in a special message to Congress, recognizing that we were not upon the gold standard, but that coin meant the double standard, declared that there was—such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold in favor of the latter, as represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest. In the agreement just concluded the annual saving in interest to the Government, if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved, would be $539,159, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

But why need I continue an argument the conclusion of which is so self-evident? Our friends who are now the advocates of this bill have themselves heretofore refuted their own proposition. I read now from the political platforms of the year 1892. There were three parties in the field in that year—the Republican, the Democratic, and the Populist. They agreed upon one thing—in pledging their fidelity to bimetallism. There is no better statement of the case than that made in the Republican platform of that year. I have heretofore indorsed it and I indorse it now, both in its historical recitals and in its legal and logical conclusion. It declared:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its workingmen, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the Government shall be as good as any other. We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

The Democratic party at Chicago made a stout and explicit utterance in favor of practically the same principle:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for minting; but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value.

The Populists demanded the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1. The President who was elected, to wit, Mr. Cleveland, declared in accepting this bimetallic standard platform—

I find much relief in the reflection that I have been selected merely to stand for the principles and purposes to which my party is pledged and for the enforcement and supremacy of which all who have any right to claim Democratic fellowship must constantly and persistently labor.

On what particular day or at what particular time his Administration ever labored in behalf of the doctrine which they proclaimed their espousal of I have never been advised, but I do know the fact and am witness to the fact that they did labor to repeal the Sherman law without a substitute, and that all promises which floated in the air as to what they would do thereafter remained floating in the air.

The United States has never been at any time actually on the gold standard. It was only nominally and theoretically so between February 12, 1873, when the gold-dollar piece was declared unit of value, until February 28, 1878, when the Bland-Allison Act made the silver dollar again co-standard and co-unit of value. The gold piece was made unit of value in contemplation of the resumption of specie payments, which was to take place on the 1st of January, 1879, and which it was desired to make take place in gold, but before that time it was no longer so. The declaration of the statute was never effective. It was dead before it was formally killed, annulled, and buried.

Mr. President, I object to this bill in that it declares in the first section that which is not true as a matter of fact or as a matter of law. If we want to go to the gold standard we have the power to do it, but let us not go to the gold standard in false disguise. There are other objections to the bill, and one of them is that it affirms the continuance of a thing which has long ceased to be.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Treasury Department under all Administrations has held the reserve fund of $100,000,000 in gold as security for the redemption of the greenback United States notes in gold, although our statutes only require that they shall be redeemable in "coin." It is not true that the Treasury construes the word "coin" to mean gold any more than it means silver; but as it means both gold and silver the Treasury has exercised its option to select gold, and its selection of gold as one of the media of payment has been called by some the adoption of the gold standard, whereas it is a mere exercise of discretion under the double standard.

The next objection to this bill is that it perpetuates "the endless chain" which has opened wide the vaults of the Treasury under the discretion of the Secretaries, and will now under this bill open them wide to future gold raids under the express command of law. What has been a bad practice and an ill administration is made under this bill a legal necessity.

The "endless chain" is that system of Treasury mechanism by which gold has been taken out of the reserve fund by the presentation of United States notes for redemption, and then replenished by bonds or otherwise, only to be taken out again by the reissues of the same notes or the presentation of other notes which are redeemable on demand in "coin."

Our experience under the Cleveland Administration is still fresh in the memory of the people, and it is not likely to be forgotten. When that Administration came into power on the 4th of March, 1893, the retiring Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, had already in preparation bonds to be issued to obtain specie for redemption purposes, and the panic of 1890 was still on hand.

The causes of the panic were well known to those who studied commercial reports, for it had been portended by increasing failures from the year 1888, and it had been precipitated in 1890 by the acuteness of stringent conditions. When this stringency pressed severely onto Great Britain, the Barings failed and the panic came.

For a while the rapid issue of silver money under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890, mollified conditions here, but in 1893, in order to dislodge silver, there came a general hue and cry from the banks and other capitalistic sources that the silver which was relieving panicky conditions was the cause of them. The associated banks refused discounts unless that law were repealed, and under the influence of this massive force and the active use of patronage by the Cleveland Administration the end was accomplished.

But, Mr. President, much of the surrounding argument in favor of the repeal was mere stage play.

In the report of the British commission known as the Herschel report it had been said that—

The closing of the Indian mints would no doubt make it more likely that the United States would give up buying silver.

The Indian mints were closed to silver coinage in the summer of 1893, and quickly thereupon came the Cleveland message convening Congress in urgent special session to repeal the Sherman law—co-responsive to the British plan, which was to lead off in India and have the United States follow.

The Sherman law was repealed November 1, 1893, ere the Cleveland Administration was a year old; but the effects promised were not realized, and the country dragged along at a weary pace until that Administration departed. During its existence our Treasury was used to furnish Austria and other European monarchies with gold to prepare them for the gold standard, and bonds issued at less than their market value were used to replenish the gold dipped out of the Treasury by greenbacks.

This ill system of which we have had so startling and profound warning is enlarged perpetually in this bill. Instead of $100,000,000 gold reserve behind the greenbacks, we are to have under this bill a bigger, larger, and stronger endless chain. The gold reserve is to be $150,000,000; and all the United States notes or greenbacks and the Treasury notes given in purchase of silver bullion to be coined, and which are specifically payable in silver, with the discretion to pay them in gold, are to be redeemable out of this reserve fund.

This reserve is to be refreshed by exchanging the notes redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury, or for deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or any subtreasury. And then if the fund shall fall below $100,000,000, it is to be lifted back to the maximum by borrowing money. And so the endless chain, continually winding up and running out, may pile up any amount of debt on this nation until it is taxed and worried into retiring the obligations resting upon them—a step contemplated, but postponed now until a more convenient season. It would not do to undertake that which is projected pending a Presidential election.

We again object to this bill because it annexes us to the single gold standard of European nations, thus making their system a part of our system; thus opening us to the evil effects of anything that affects them; thus making our nervous financial system a part of their nervous financial system; thus placing us upon the most perilous and unstable standard of money that the art of man could now invent.

The exhaustion of a gold mine, or the segregation of a gold mine from commerce, would then abbreviate the supply of gold, and gold being the only source of metallic monetary supply, its diminution would be felt throughout the commercial world.

INSTABILITY OF THE GOLD STANDARD.

It is vain for the opposition to talk of gold being a stable standard of value. It can never be stable as long as any uncertainty exists as to the amount of it that will enter into the circulation. Look at the figures as to its production and you see that it is but as mercury in a thermometer, running up and down and in perpetual movement, varying in amount and varying in value just as it is the more or less produced. And even if some edict could be issued fixing the precise and invariable amount of gold that should compose the money of nations, no stability could be imparted to its value. Its amount, indeed, would be stable, except that the moth and rust might still corrupt and thieves break in. But population would increase; business would increase; development here and there would go on.

The world would still turn round and round—new lands would be opened, and new enterprises started, and new inventions made. As new demands pressed for gold its value would increase, and stability in its amount would be the instant and sure cause of its variability in value.

The fact is, no dollar of any kind ever was or ever can be invariable in commercial value, for a dollar is worth what a dollar will buy, and every day the prices of what man needs and buys with a dollar change, and run up and down and skip about with ever-evasive nimbleness.

The only invariability that a dollar can have is that which law gives it, in the amount of taxes and debt that it will pay, and that is its legal-tender quality.

The fathers of the Republic discerned and knew this truth. They provided that Congress should coin money and should regulate the value thereof; not the commercial value, but the only one stable value that can be imparted to the thing; and when the monometallists of this country took away from silver that one constitutional, common-law, and historic value, they cast it out as a wanderer upon the face of the earth and disinherited it from its kingdom.

We object to this bill because it lets down the value of silver and purports to reject that metal finally as one of the money metals of the country. Who is there that can foretell the consequences of this act in this respect? Who can measure the calamity that it may bring upon our country and upon the human race?

In the work of Richard P. Rothwell, editor of the Engineering and Mining Journal, called "Universal Bimetallism," published in 1896, there are some words of warning to gold monometallists worth considering. Events since 1896 have tended in accordance with his foreshadowings, but their effect has been relieved to a degree by the large production of gold. Were that arrested, they would be more acutely felt.

Mr. Rothwell says, page 14:

> When once the conviction had become general that silver would no longer be a money metal, and that its value would depend upon its physical properties alone, and would be regulated, as is that of other metals, by the surplus stock on the market, then the demand for silver in the arts would heavily decline. Indeed, no one would buy silver to-day at 75 cents per ounce if he believed that within a year it would be worth 40 or 20 cents.
>
> The glamour of traditional value in money having disappeared and there being an enormous stock of the metal on hand, its price would probably sink not only far below cost of production but even below its intrinsic value as a metal; but where the market price would stop, whether at 50 cents, at 30, at 20, or at 10 cents per ounce, no one can tell.
>
> Aside from its use in money it would find such limited use at even 20 cents an ounce that the stock on hand would supply the market for very many years, and it is unlikely that, if universally demonetized, the present stock could be marketed promptly at even that price. It is true the whole amount might not be sold at the assumed minimum price, but there would also be a considerable loss on the subsidiary coinage, which would have to be increased in weight to prevent counterfeiting when the value of the metal declined so heavily.
>
> The actual loss through the demonetization of silver would not by any means be measured by this sudden destruction of, say, $2,000,000,000 in the value of the world's stock of silver money. The silver-basis nations would necessarily be obliged to buy gold and adopt the gold standard, and there would quickly result a general "scramble" for the metal. The inhabitants of India would "run for gold," and would buy it at any price with the silver they have. The United States would, very probably, endeavor to greatly increase its holding of gold; perhaps it might endeavor to buy and hold from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000, issuing bonds to pay for the same.
> What would happen if the United States should enter the market to buy even $100,000,000 of gold; the Indian government and the native Indians, even $300,000,000; Mexico, South America, Japan, China, and the rest of the silver world, even only $300,000,000 of gold; or in all, say, $800,000,000, should no European country join in the "scramble?" What would be the effect of such an advance in the purchasing power of the then sole standard of values? Would it not close the workshops of the world and bring commerce to a stand? Can any man conceive the horrors and the barbarisms which would be the outcome of destitution and starvation caused by the general stoppage of the wheels of industry?
>
> The policy of allowing such a problem to "work itself out" is barbarous; its consequences are far too momentous to allow of such ignorant experimenting.
>
> Great Britain is the great commercial, the great creditor nation. She supplies every country with her manufactures and invests her enormous wealth in the securities, the bonds, stocks, mortgages, real estate, etc., of nearly every country.
> The amount of her holdings of foreign securities has been estimated by eminent authorities at something like $9,000,000,000, or more than the entire amount of the gold and silver money of the world. It is to her interest, infinitely more than to that of any other nation, that the purchasers of her manufactures, those who keep her factories running, the borrowers to whom she lends her wealth, should be prosperous and have a stable money.
>
> England, more than any other nation, can facilitate a happy solution of this problem; and she, by simply holding back and doing nothing, can precipitate these dangers and disasters which must inevitably follow the sudden change which is now taking place in the standards of values.
> With England's assent to some such plan as is here proposed, that of the world would probably be assured, so that the responsibility for the consequences of failure to adopt it or the credit for securing this great step in civilization will rest upon Great Britain. The United States, the Latin Union, South America, Mexico, India, and nearly all other countries would unquestionably favor a plan which would prevent a sudden change in the value of silver and that would promise such an immense improvement in their monetary affairs.

Silver has tended just as he predicted and just as any man could foresee that it would tend. But to-day, Mr. President, there is nearly as much silver money in the world as gold. This bill projects at all that money a blow which will be felt throughout the civilized world; and when the bottom is knocked out of so immense a mass of silver and the contemplation of the world is turned to its continued disfranchisement, he is a wiser man than I am if he can foretell what will happen. But certainly the tendency will not be such as to insure financial conditions or to continue the prosperity of the world.

The American delegates to the international conference defined bimetallism and international bimetallism, and defined them perfectly when they declared their policy to be—

> Unrestricted coinage of both gold and silver into money of full debt-paying power, at a uniform ratio in coinage between the two metals.

That was bimetallism, and adding the words "to be determined by an international agreement" they defined international bimetallism.

I am not opposed to international bimetallism. No one in the United States is opposed to international bimetallism. It would be a boon to the human race. But, Mr. President, the man who stops helping himself to wait for somebody else to come to help him is a traditional character and a ne'er-do-well. I am not willing that my country should refuse to help itself because it has danced in vain in attendance at the courts of European kings.

But let me remind my colleagues that no international agreement led to or constituted the now widely diffused gold standard. We are not now asked to adopt gold as the sole standard as any part of an international agreement. If we do it, it is not by contract with anyone else, but of our own free will. One nation led off for the gold standard—Great Britain, in 1816. Others have followed her. We are in the condition to reaffirm and lead off for the continuance and perfection of the double standard; and if we did, others would gladly follow us.

Men follow men who lead and nations follow nations that lead. We are a nation that can lead and that has led. If we choose to bring ourselves up at the end of a procession of subservient gold worshipers we can do it, but in doing it let us not forget that it is the gods who help those who help themselves.

We will have no bimetallism, Mr. President, if this bill shall pass, but a wretched, shifty, shriveled, dwarfed, humpbacked, head-bowed, broken-legged, lame, halt, and blind specter of bimetallism.

We have four metals in our currency—gold, silver, nickel, and copper. We had as well call the system proposed quadrimetallism as to call it bimetallism. What makes bimetallism is:

1. Equal coinage rights to both metals.
2. A fixed ratio of coinage.
3. Full legal-tender capacity, or
4. Full standard quality, which is the same thing.

None of these features will exist in silver or be projected or prospective to silver, if this bill passes. These features have been already mutilated and marred by our false doctrine. Now they will be erased. Silver will be a subsidiary currency like copper and nickel. It will be also a credit currency like greenbacks. Will it still, while it lasts, and before it is finally destroyed, have legal-tender quality?

I should like to submit that question to my honorable friends of the Finance Committee.

The House bill contains in its second section the following provision:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

The Senate substitute contains neither these nor any similar words. Why were they left out? Is it intended at once to destroy the legal-tender quality of silver, of silver certificates, of the greenback currency? Altogether they amount to a billion of dollars. Should a question be left open as to their status? Certainly not. The matter is too large and too serious to be lightly dealt with. This provision should be put back in the bill. And then what? Why, then a vast part of our paper currency and a vast part of our metallic silver currency will be units and standards of value.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator must be aware——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUARLES in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. With great pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Virginia must be aware that there is nothing in the Senate substitute which in any manner affects the legal-tender qualities of silver or its status in our monetary system.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to what it does? You propose to fund the entire debt in gold bonds and to make everything payable in gold. Silver will not do it, and that destroys silver.

Mr. ALDRICH. We make those bonds and nothing else payable in gold.

Mr. STEWART. Nothing else would include the entire indebtedness of the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no. If the Senator from Nevada will pardon me——

Mr. STEWART. You propose to fund the entire debt in gold bonds and to issue gold bonds. There will be no Government indebtedness but gold bonds, and silver will not pay them. That destroys the legal-tender quality of silver.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Nevada will admit that all obligations which are now by contract made payable either in silver or gold are not affected by this proposed legislation. We do not in any respect in the slightest degree take away from silver any of its qualities, legal tender or otherwise, or affect in any manner either the legal-tender notes or the silver or the United States Treasury notes.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the raison d'etre of this bill or the foundation of its existence is the theory of its sponsors that we are upon the gold standard, but as the Democrats dispute that fact, they want to clear away what they are pleased to dignify by the name of doubt. Why, then, when the Senator was clearing up doubt, or when the committee was clearing up doubt, did they leave a door so wide open for this question?

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no door wide open or shut about it. We do not change in any respect, by implication or otherwise——

Mr. DANIEL. Why do you take it out of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator. I want to go on and make my observations.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Here comes, Mr. President, a bill from the House of Representatives which declares that it does not intend to interfere with the legal-tender character of Treasury notes, greenbacks, or notes; and here comes the committee and strikes that out of a substitute bill, while preserving many other features.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. Then I say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Is not that designed to raise a question? Put the words back, and it ends the debate on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Virginia is undoubtedly aware that the House bill to which he has alluded contains a provision which makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold, and puts at the end of that a provision that that provision shall not affect the legal-tender quality of silver.

Mr. DANIEL. And it contradicts itself.

Mr. ALLISON. It uses the phraseology of the present legal-tender act.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of the present act. There was no necessity of any such provision in the Senate bill, because there is nothing in the Senate bill which makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold.

Mr. DANIEL. In my judgment, Mr. President, this provision of the House bill ought to be put in the Senate bill. The Senator's answer in debate will not be the law of this case.

But if the Senator be correct, let us see in what an attitude this country is placing itself. In the first section the bill declares that an old and rejected gold unit shall be hereafter the unit and standard of value. But if it be true that it will not be the unit of value and standard of value, but only a co-unit or standard of value with some $800,000,000 of greenbacks and Treasury notes, we would still in one end of the bill refute and contradict the legal conclusion of this first section, and the declaration that we are going upon a gold standard would be driven back and repulsed by a new declaration that we intended to preserve the silver standard.

Mr. President, merely declaring a country to have a particular standard does not decisively, conclusively, and perfectly work out the practical effect of the standard. I understand that the design, and perhaps the foremost design, of the authors of this bill is to make our public obligations payable in gold and in nothing else than gold. Now, I ask the Senator from Rhode Island this question: Should this bill pass, will our certificates be thereafter compulsorily payable in gold or only at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. ALDRICH. Neither, under the Senate bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Neither?

Mr. ALDRICH. Neither.

Mr. DANIEL. They will not be payable either in gold or silver.

Mr. ALDRICH. They will be payable in silver, of course. That was not the question the Senator asked. They will be payable in silver, of course.

Mr. DANIEL. He will have no discretion to pay? The $88,000,000 of Treasury notes will not be payable in gold if this bill passes?

Mr. ALDRICH. Treasury notes. That is not the question the Senator asked. He asked me about silver certificates.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought I asked about both.

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. DANIEL. How about Treasury notes?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly the Treasury notes will be redeemable in gold.

Mr. DANIEL. And how about the greenbacks?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DANIEL. And silver certificates.

Mr. ALDRICH. The silver certificates will be redeemable in silver dollars as they are now.

Mr. DANIEL. And the Secretary of the Treasury will have no discretion to pay them in gold?

Mr. ALDRICH. None whatever.

Mr. DANIEL. In other words, then, this bill undertakes to destroy the discretion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; he will have whatever discretion he has now.

Mr. DANIEL. That is what I asked.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not take away from him whatever discretion he may have now.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, if gold is adopted as the sole standard of value and silver is no longer a standard of value——

Mr. ALDRICH. It never has been.

Mr. DANIEL. Do you think he could pay in something that was not a standard of value?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator must know that silver certificates are simply certificates of deposit, which, when required, it becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay in silver dollars to the holder of the certificates upon presentation.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand that is the case; but I am speaking about legislation on the subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the status of the silver certificate is not changed by this proposed law any more than the status of the gold certificate is changed. The holder of the silver certificate is entitled to take that piece of paper to the Treasury and get a silver dollar for it, if it is a dollar.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, as I understand it, according to the theory of this bill only the $346,000,000 of greenbacks and the $88,000,000 of Treasury notes are payable in gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. Are specifically redeemable in gold.

Mr. DANIEL. Specifically redeemable in gold.

Mr. ALLISON. Or actually.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, do I further understand that the Treasury notes which are now, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, payable in either gold or silver, can not be paid by him in gold? I mean the silver certificates. I called them by the wrong name. It is the Treasury notes of 1890.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hardly understand the question. If the Senator will repeat it, I will be very glad to answer it.

Mr. DANIEL. I will apply it to the silver certificates which were issued under the Bland Act. They will not be, as I understand the Senator, compulsorily payable in gold if this act passes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not. The status remains exactly the same as it was before.

Mr. DANIEL. They will be payable only in silver dollars. Then I should like to ask the Senator whether or not there is anything in this bill which reenforces the value of a silver dollar or which provides for maintaining its parity with gold? Suppose it is not at par with gold. What agency will the Secretary of the Treasury exercise under this bill to make it so?

Mr. ALDRICH. He will have the use of the same agencies by which he has kept silver dollars at a parity with gold in the past, if he has employed any such agencies.

Mr. DANIEL. If he has. Does the Senator know whether he has employed such agencies, and will he refer me to any statute in which such agency is provided for?

Mr. ALDRICH. We know that the result has been obtained by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not certain about the method which he has employed; I am satisfied about the result, and I should be satisfied with that result in the future.

Mr. DANIEL. So, then, Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield to a question or to information, either.

Mr. ALLISON. I will put it in the form of a question then. Is it not well known that silver dollars and silver certificates are receivable for all public dues of every name and character?

Mr. DANIEL. It is perfectly well known here. Everybody in the country knows it.

Mr. ALLISON. Including the salaries which we now receive.

Mr. STEWART. Not under this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course.

Mr. STEWART. No; not under this bill. I will show you when I have a chance.

Mr. ALLISON. We will see later whether they are not. All salaries and all public dues are made payable in silver. Does the Senator not believe that that is an element which makes the silver certificate and the silver dollar equal in circulation to gold in our country? Not one thing——

Mr. DANIEL. I should like the Senator to make his own speech in his own time. That is what I am preaching to-day. He states my views of the case better than I can state them myself.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not interrupt the Senator further. I will ask him a question. The Senator says we should incorporate in the Senate substitute the proviso in the first section of the House bill, which speaks of continuing the legal-tender quality of the greenbacks, etc. I wish him to explain to me what the House bill means, because he says we should incorporate it, when it says it is not the intention to interfere with the present legal-tender quality.

Mr. DANIEL. What this bill means?

Mr. ALLISON. What the House bill means, which he says we should incorporate in the Senate substitute, when it says the present legal-tender quality is not being interfered with.

Mr. DANIEL. It means exactly what it says, that it does not intend to alter the present legal tender.

Mr. ALLISON. The present legal-tender quality.

Mr. DANIEL. But I am suspicious of anything that comes in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. But that would be subserved by saying the legal-tender quality.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, the Senator from Rhode Island has thrown up the sponge as to the project of this bill, for we have $392,000,000 in silver money, either in the form of actual coined dollars or in certificates for them. While this bill sets forth in its title that it intends to maintain the parity of all forms of money, he has left this vast volume of our metallic money wholly unprovided for and out in the cold; and the only silver money that in this bill is predicated upon the $150,000,000 of gold reserve is the $88,000,000, as I understand it, of Treasury notes issued under the law of 1890.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the silver dollars which are now outstanding need any particular care or redemption to preserve their parity or value?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not know that they do.

Mr. STEWART. Do they need any legislation to prevent them from paying the public debt?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not know that they do. But what I am discussing is the pretended theory and its lack of parity with the practical operation of this bill. While I have no doubt that there inheres in the bill the design and the ultimate purpose to accomplish as fast as possible the overthrowing of the immense mass of silver money in the world, when the actors have set forth their tentative steps they have bowed to the power of $392,000,000 of silver dollars in this country to work out their own support and sustain themselves; and while it is pretended upon the forefront of the bill that it is designed to maintain all forms of money at parity, it has left out one-half of that money unprovided for, or nearly one-half, showing, what bimetallists have always contended and what the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has just so well expressed, that if we will put the dollar into metal the metal will maintain itself as a dollar.

I admit that there might be such an immense production of either silver or gold as to destroy the parity of the two metals, but the production of silver as compared to that of gold in the world to-day is much less than that of 16 to 1; and if the mighty agencies which have been employed to find gold in all parts of the earth had been directed to the maintenance of the double standard, I have no doubt that to-day the world's finances would be much better and that the prosperity of this country would be much greater.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to say just a word in that connection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield to any statement of fact, but I do not want the Senator to interject a speech into mine.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not do so.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be very glad to have any information the Senator wishes to furnish.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to express my personal opinion that the United States could maintain 392,000,000 dollars, each containing 412½ grains of copper, at a parity with gold if we should give this limited amount of these coins the same rights and privileges we now give to the silver dollars.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very happy to see that the Senator is so rapidly improving in his knowledge and appreciation of the genius of bimetallism. [Laughter.] He begins to state its theories almost as well as its advocates state them. I am pleased to have his confession and shall look for more hereafter.

Mr. President, of all the countries that ever were upon the face of the earth this country ought to stand by bimetallism. When we hear such able and experienced financiers as the honorable Senator from Rhode Island thus maintain the power of this Government is so great that it could transmogrify copper into equal value with gold and maintain it to the extent of three or four hundred millions, I hope that he will take opportunity to indoctrinate his constituents in such broad and liberal views and to recant some of the warnings which he has given them as to bimetallism.

Mr. ALDRICH. I trust there is not an intelligent citizen in the country who does not understand my statement.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator will not inject a speech into mine. I always delight to hear him talk.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well; I shall not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. In the first place, Mr. President, this is a Republic; bimetallism is in the interest of the masses of the people of this Republic. Gold monometallism originated in imperialism, and to-day it is a more powerful agent of imperialism than all the guns in the parks of imperial artillery. It is supported by aristocracy, by autocracy, and by monarchy the world over. It is in their interest, and not in the interest of the masses of the people, and like to like the wide world over.

This, Mr. President, is not only a Republic, but it is an offspring of the British or English race. Silver existed as money before our forefathers came here. The first English charter, under which the earliest band of white men made their lodgment upon these shores, provided for a mint that they might coin their own money. Daniel Webster once declared that he was "certainly of opinion"—not dubiously—"that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this standard."

The spirit of the Constitution passes out of this bill and the spirit of imperialism enters the financial system of our country with the adoption of this gold standard. The honorable James G. Blaine, at one time the brilliant leader of the Republican party of this country, has left himself upon record in concurrence with the legal opinion of Daniel Webster.

I believe—

Said he—

I believe gold and silver to be the money of the Constitution; indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence.

We have always had bimetallism in this country, Mr. President, in more or less perfect form. We had it in the colonies; we had it in the Confederation, and for one hundred and seven years we have had it in the United States. "The American people, from tradition and from interest"—was the assertion of the Republican party—"favor bimetallism." Their traditions have not yet been broken; their interests as yet have not changed; and every Republican in this body or outside has stood as sponsor for this statement of facts.

We are still as much interested in bimetallism as we were then. First, because we are a bimetal-producing nation, and because this continent is a bimetal-producing continent. The United States and its next-door neighbor, Mexico, produce nearly seven-tenths of the silver of the world. Had we the world in arms against us, were we compelled to stand here and fight the other civilized nations of the globe, we have the metal money in our mines; we have all that can support and cherish the life of man in our fields; the God of our fathers has bestowed upon us all the gifts of nature that befit our perfect independence. Why, then, Mr. President, should we chime in with one nation or another nation, or with all the nations of the world, in treading down our history, our traditions, and our interests?

Here in the United States, Mr. President, as elsewhere, and more than elsewhere, everything is consolidating, everything is expanding—railroads, oil, tin, tobacco, spirits, wine, bread, meat, clothes—everything is in a trust, everything expanding—trade expanding, manufacturing expanding, population expanding, land expanding, the Government itself expanding and stretching itself over wide areas of territory and population.

Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands are new names in our American geography. They are new territories, and from ten to twelve million new inhabitants are under Congressional legislation. What has been their currency? Silver for the most part. What has become of it? It is mere bullion now, or held up by the sustaining arm of our Federal law or by military declaration at 60 cents on the dollar.

We must provide money for these people whom we have taken to us, and money for the seventy-odd millions of people that we have, and in a decade we shall have over 100,000,000 souls in our charge to provide for. What a calamity would a shrinking currency be to this immense mass of men! What a calamity if a few bank presidents could get together and tighten the money market at will! But it is proposed under this bill to refund all of our debt and to replace the stopped and destroyed silver mines by opening a mine of paper money, and predicating that upon gold and not upon silver.

I have not the time nor opportunity to go into that feature of this bill, and I have already detained the Senate too long. I shall bring my remarks to a close, Mr. President; but before I close I will indicate what would seem to me to be the policy of this country in contravention to the projections of policy contained in this bill. Not forgetting that all of our currencies are now at par, not forgetting that gold up to date is flowing to this country, not forgetting that both agriculture and manufactures are continuing to bring gold here, I would stop discriminating and legislating against silver, and at least not attempt so radical a step in our finances as is here contemplated.

Pay your bonds in gold if you think it expedient to do so. To America this alone would be a bagatelle; and as to the rest, if the face and the hand could be turned to help silver and to perpetuate it, the bond matter might readily be disposed of. By itself it is insignificant. If paid in gold, the reason of such payment should be placed on the true ground of expediency, and should not be rested upon the preposterous, untenable, and illegal ground that we are bound either legally, morally, or equitably to do so.

Keep all our metal money at par. This we have done for a hundred years, either perfectly or approximately, as to silver, without any redemption of it; and the reassuring words of the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee to-day, that this country is so powerful and the legal-tender quality imparted to anything is so valuable we need not rest with any apprehension as to our future ability to do it without putting ourselves in debt.

Our present stock of silver can easily be kept at par with gold, as it has been since 1893, now nearly seven years. By the simple process of preserving its legal-tender quality we will preserve its par value.

Then, something more is to be done. Keep up and do not in any way relax or abandon an international agreement, and take the steps that will make it grow. Mexico would gladly unite and join with us for an international agreement. She holds on to silver. In the last three years she has become the first silver-producing nation of the world, going ahead of us.

The South Americans and Central Americans would join with us. Unite with them; make silver an American policy, an American creed, as we have done as to the Monroe doctrine; strike hands with that great Republic of Europe which was our friend in the war of the Revolution and which we can never think of without gratitude for the help that she gave us—strike hands with France, which, through her able financiering, is to-day maintaining at par $36 per capita for all her people and prospering, even under the immense burdens which have been heaped upon her; strike hands also in the far East, in our new possessions, in the Philippines, and in China, to which they project. There has been silver for the most part in the Philippines. That ocean of humanity which resides in Asia uses almost altogether silver, with recent innovations under the auspices of the gold propaganda.

With Cuba and Puerto Rico on one hand, with Mexico and the South American States and with the Philippines and China upon the other hand, who will say that the leading nation of the earth, with all its power and prestige, can not preserve the constitutional money of its people and maintain it as the very best money that the world has ever seen?

On the other hand, Mr. President, I can but feel that America is going back upon her rightful destiny and receding much from the great stand that she has always taken upon all questions which involve the prosperity and freedom and the betterment of the great masses of the people. Let our diplomatic powers of this country, in all lands, in all ways, try to build up that which autocracy, aristocracy, plutocracy, and imperialism are everywhere with united efforts trying to pull down.

Do as to silver that which England has done as to gold. One hundred years ago there was no single standard amongst the English-speaking race. How does it get here? In 1816 England, always a leading nation, always a bold nation, always a brave nation, went forward and laid down that law which was to her interest.

The very opposite law is to our interest. Let us do what she would have done had she been, as we are, a debtor nation and not a creditor nation; had she been, as we are, the greatest silver-producing nation of the earth, until we have commenced to dethrone ourselves; had she been, as we are, a nation abounding in raw materials and in food products; had she been, as we are, a new and undeveloped nation, with opportunities all around us waiting for money and enterprise to assume, adopt, and take up—yea, Mr. President, had her fortunes been united, as our fortunes are, with the elevation of the human race from the bottom and with the enlightenment and betterment of all mankind.

I would turn my face, Mr. President, against imperialism in any shape. It is in liberality, it is in breadth of view, it is in tying ourselves to those things that stay throughout the ages, and not to the fashion of a day, that this Republic will best work out its destiny.

I know, Mr. President, or at least I feel, that in this body at present gold is conqueror. The conquest of the world by gold has been the most momentous fact in the history of modern times. It is in Austria-Hungary, it is in Brazil, it is in Costa Rica, it is in British Honduras, Chile, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Great Britain, Japan, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Russia, Sweden, and Turkey; and among the nations who have sought to discredit silver and to put it down to be minted, not on private but only on public account, are the United States, Belgium, France, Holland, Italy, Spain, India, Switzerland, Greece, and Venezuela.

When one sees this immense array of great nations nearly everywhere adopting the gold standard, he may feel for a moment discouraged in the effort to restore and build up silver. But, Mr. President, can not anyone discern beneath the gilt that is being spread all over the world a danger which it itself produced? If only a few great nations had adopted the gold standard, the rest might take silver; but the debts of the world have been doubled in the last forty years, and they are still increasing.

They were $13,000,000,000 in 1862; they are over thirty-two billions now; and all the tendencies of the future are toward the increase of this indebtedness and toward the decrease and letting down of the medium of payment. Ought we not to make a stand? Is it wisdom for us to follow them? Does liberty go with their standard or does power and the betterment of securities?

Gold, Mr. President, is now the conqueror in the United States; and perhaps those of us who regret it should say to it as it passes up to its throne:

Te Cæsar morituri salutamus.

But, Mr. President, it goes to that throne with omens in the air which he who will may read. On the very day that the gold bill passed the House of Representatives the bank rate of discount in Berlin was raised to 7 per cent. The Northern and London Bank, of London, England, with a capital of $10,000,000, suspended payment, and there were heavy failures on the London Stock Exchange. On the same day the Produce Exchange Trust Company failed in New York. If it had been a silver bill that passed that day instead of a gold bill, how every mercantile journal in the United States would have raised its voice in holy horror, and, pointing to the Congress, said, "Behold what these anarchists are doing!"

Uneasiness, Mr. President, has pervaded and still deeply pervades the market, and the united capitalists of the world have used and are using every effort to sustain it. They want everybody to feel good and prosperous and happy while their pet project is in course of parturition. Meanwhile, Mr. President, silence reigns in the country, and reigns here for the most part. No petitions are being presented to us in favor of the gold standard. Its advocates elsewhere are for the most part silent, and they prefer silence here; but a majority is here, grim and silent as the guillotine, ready to do its work.

In the meantime elsewhere the work of gold goes on. The East has been the great market of the world's silver; and the ocean of humanity in China, in India, and in other regions of the East has sucked in with perpetual appetite the silver resources of the world, but in 1893 the great imperial nation from which we are descended stopped the India mints. There has been a great famine in that country since, and there is a great famine there now.

As Lord Hamilton said, it is not a famine for bread, but a famine for money. It takes to-day about twice as much for the poor Indian people to pay their debts to Great Britain as it did in 1893; and that nation, prostrate and wretched as it is, with silver that it can not use, sighs for gold that it can not get.
